The timing of the picture is based on a speed of 15 minutes to a thousand feet. The time indication will help the leader to anticipate the various cues which may consist of the printed sub-title (marked T) or a described action (marked D). For instance: 7½ T "The Germans would pay——" is a sub-title and is printed reading matter on the screen. But 29 D "When brother leaves gun," is a description of action.

Marie Chaumontel, a beautiful, fascinating woman, employed as an agent for the German secret service, uses her charms to inveigle the military secrets from susceptible, young French officers. Having caused the ruin of Captain Henri Ravignac, her lover, by stealing his plans, she continues her secret profession, but is thwarted through Henri's brother, who has sworn to seek vengeance, and in the end she is entrapped into prison through the efforts of his brother officer.

The character of this picture is a modern military drama with scenes of action in France. There are other scenes at the German Embassy and French War Bureau.

It is suggested that no national patriotic music be used with the exception at 67½ "France cannot bestow——" where "La Marseillaise" would be appropriate.

Note particularly: Shot at 29½: wireless effects at 33¾ and continued according to action throughout the picture.

The theme selected is "Entr'Act 'Clarice'"—(Valse Intermezzo)— Loud.

Time schedule: 70 minutes (5 reels—about 4,675 feet).

The Two Sides of the Question.

By S. M. BERG.

I am in receipt of the following letter, which perhaps may be in the minds of other correspondents, and for that reason it is being published in these columns.

Chicago, Ill., Sept. 25, 1916.

Musical Editor,
Moving Picture World,
New York City.

Dear Sir:

I read with a good deal of interest your articles in the Moving Picture World, and must admit that from time to time I have found many good hints and ideas. But don't you think you are just a little hard on us musicians? I suppose there are slackers, but I feel that the majority are sincere in their work and do strive to do their best.

I have been in the motion picture business now for about two and one-half years, and find that my hand is continually in my pocket for the purchase of music.

I have an orchestra of six musicians, and always buy for small orchestra. I depend on an average about five dollars a week for music, and yet my manager frequently complains that I play the same stuff too often. In a discussion with some of my musician friends, this seems to be a common thing for the managers to complain of the musician's library, and all my friends tell me that they also expend a regular sum of money for the purchase of music. It seems to me that you have somewhat pulled the long bow in accounting some of your personal incidents, although I must confess they are entertaining enough.

In conclusion, however, I must tell you that I always look forward for my Moving Picture World, and always turn to your music page.

I remain, yours sincerely,

(Signed) Jack Awstein.

In answer to this correspondence, I can assure him and my readers that I am not in the habit of overdrawing incidents, or recounting imaginary circumstances. In my ten years' experience in New York City, the class of men whom I had to contend with, is impossible to imagine. Musicians and readers should realize that in the past two years, men have turned to the motion picture industry, who previously looked down with scorn at the work.

To show as a concrete example the conditions which are even to day being met with, I submit the following letter. It does not seem possible that such a thing has happened, but the original of this letter is in my possession, and can be seen by a visit to my office. Perhaps some of the readers may have seen an advertisement of mine in this paper drawing attention to a new series of Incidental Music.

Monett, Mo., Oct. 1st, 1916.

S. M. Berg,
New York City.

Dear Sir:

I am from Missouri, and an orchestra leader in a five-hundred seat theater known as the Bijou. I don't buy music, but if you have anything to give me, come on with it. There are no music stores here, and the music business (small order) is large at this time of the year, and our three-piece orchestra introduces all the music here. We know how much advertising we do and we do not even think of buying music.

We would rather have piano than orchestrations, as we have only piano, violin (me), and drums. This is my second season here, so I am not so bad, am I?

Now don't send me anything to buy. It is entirely foolish to do so. I will appreciate anything you send. If it is good we will put it on our program. Add General Delivery.

Yours truly,
(Signed) C. C. Melton,
Bijou Theater.

Here is the other side of the question, and my answer to my first correspondent. Here is a fellow supposed to be playing for the pictures in his second season, and he candidly admits that he does not buy any music. What sort of manager can there be in this house? It would be interesting to hear his ideas of musical interpretation for the films, and more interesting to hear Musician Melton interpret a picture.

I leave it to my readers to decide whether I overdraw my imagination, when I am in possession of such a letter.

An Unusual Presentation

"The Dawnmaker," Put On at the Liberty Theater, Seattle, Wash., in Extraordinary Manner.

WILLIAM S. HART'S "The Dawnmaker" was the latest Triangle-Ince feature staged by J. G. von Herberg. After a private showing of "The Dawnmaker," Mr. von Herberg decided that this picture deserved special advertising, staging and music, and that the point on which these should revolve was the Northland, that vast region where romance goes hand in hand with adventure, where man rules and loves by right of primal might.

Gordon F. Fullerton, advertising manager of the Liberty, built his cuts to carry this theme, and emphasized Hart's face and name, since that actor is such a favorite in Seattle. Silhouetted against an arc of the rising sun appeared a bust length portrait of Hart dressed as an Indian. Set into the sun's rays was the title of the play, "The Dawnmaker," while in the dark sky above was placed Hart's name in white letters. At the bottom of the ad was a horizon of snow-covered evergreen trees, into the solid portion of which was worked the theater's name, "Liberty," in snow-covered rustic letters. Billboards and window cards covered the city highways and business section, while framed photos of Hart and framed scenes of the play were placed in the windows of the big business houses of Seattle's "Broadway," Second avenue. Large ads were placed in the photoplay sections of the "Seattle Sunday Times" and the Saturday afternoon edition of "The Daily Star."

To create atmosphere for the picture the inside lobby was turned into a bower or cave of evergreen, the walls, ceiling headpieces of Wampum, bead embroidery, and real eagle feathers were obtained from the local branch of the Hudson Bay Fur Company.

According to Mr. von Herberg the music and lighting effects in the theater itself were the most difficult problems, for it was decided that not only should these heighten the dramatic effect of "The Dawnmaker," and serve as an introduction, but that they must be distinctive and entirely different from anything done before at the Liberty, and should set a standard that none of its competitors could copy. As the Liberty is unusually well lighted and the giant $35,000 and lights being hidden by the sweet smelling pine, spruce and fir, with a dash of color lent by autumn leaves which formed a large part of the ceiling decoration.

An Indian maid was the cashier and Indian maids were the ushers. The costumes were rented from local costumers; but to lend the necessary touch of realism genuine Indian Wurlitzer Unit orchestra is always on the job, the established order was reversed and the audience electrified by the different, the startling. Gradually the house became dark. Starting from the top and back of the theater, one by one the lights flashed out and absolute silence prevailed—the ushers seated nobody while the feature was opening. As the last light went out in front a low violin and cello duet was started on the unit orchestra, accented with the slow, solemn boom of chimes, one at a time, as if one had awakened in the dark and the grandfather clock had tolled the hour. By this time in the two lighting boxes at each side of the curtain was a dim, bluish light gradually paling to gray, and then a rosy dawn revealing distant snow capped peaks, the sky streaked with the rays of the setting sun, while in the foreground were hills covered with snow laden evergreen. As the colors changed from dim blue to gray and pink, the music suggested the hum and undertone of wild life astir at dawn, the awakening of songs of birds, dropping again to dead silence as the title, "William S. Hart's 'Dawnmaker,'" was flashed onto the curtain, only to take up the musical interpretation of the picture as the first scene of the play was framed by the opening curtain, and the audience was into the play.

Round after round of applause greeted the effect, and it has been the talk of Seattle since the opening of "The Dawnmaker," while Mr. von Herberg and Mr. Fullerton have been receiving compliments on all sides for their artistic originality. The theater was packed all day Sunday, September 24, with the crowds extending into the street in the afternoon and evening and capacity houses each of the following three afternoons that the picture ran, with standing room only in the evenings. Considering that the Liberty is a 2,200 capacity house with heavy competition, this is the more remarkable.

Musical Suggestions for "The Heart of a Hero."

Released by the World Film Corporation.
(Prepared by S. M. Berg.)

THIS "Musical Suggestion Cue Sheet" is not designed to solve every possible musical requirement of the film, but is intended as a partial solution of the problem—what to play for the picture. It has proven to be of great assistance to the leader, not only by relieving to a degree the tedium of rehearsals, but by assisting materially in overcoming those conditions encountered when the film is not available until the hour of performance.

Musical Suggestion Cue Sheets can be obtained (free of charge) by managers from their local exchange in advance of the date of release, and a sufficient number should be secured to provide one for each member of the orchestra. This will afford to the progressive leader an opportunity to acquaint himself with the general character of the film drama he is to portray with his orchestra.

Together with the suggested music at the title or descriptive cues where it is to be played, the tempo or characteristic is given so that the leader can select or substitute any or all of the numbers from his own library, thereby avoiding any financial outlay though still carrying out the interpretation.

The timing of the picture is based on a speed of 15 minutes to a thousand feet. The time indications will help the leader to anticipate the various cues which may consist of the printed sub-title (marked T) or a described action (marked D). For instance: 58¼ T "Morning" is a sub-title and is printed reading matter on the screen. But 57¼ "When Hale thinks of freedom" is a description of action.

"The Heart of a Hero" depicts the life of Nathan Hale, a young ambitious schoolmaster, who when urged on by his sweetheart Alice, takes up the side of the Colonists in their fight for liberty against England. Through his heroic efforts, he is soon made a captain and later volunteers to obtain the enemy's plans. Disguising himself, he gains the plans, but not until he is recognized by Alice's cousin, Fitzroy. His arrest as a spy follows, and when about to be hung his last words were: "I only regret that I have but one life to lose for my country."

It will be found impossible for the musician to endeavor to fit every scene in this picture, owing to the continual changes of action. Care should be used in not overloading the use of patriotic music.

Note particularly: English Airs at 38¼; English Patriotic Airs at 46¼; Spirit of '76 with drums and fife only at 57¼; Direct cue of Bugle Call at 63¼. Especially note drums only, slow beat at 80¼. Dawn (on the way to scaffold).

The THEME selected is "One Who Has Yearn'd Alone"—Tschalkowsky.

Time schedule: 87 minutes (six reels—5,500 feet).

Pictures vs. Vaudeville.

By S. M. Berg.

ON almost any important thoroughfare in New York City, attention will be drawn to a building brilliantly illuminated. Upon investigation one will find it is a theater given over to vaudeville and picture entertainment. Possibly the large electric sign will blaze to the world, the title and make of some important feature picture advertised as their star attraction, together with six acts of vaudeville.

The thought must suggest itself that the day has passed when the vaudeville performance closes with the presentation of some film. It is no more vaudeville and picture, but today "pictures and vaudeville." However, the idea is not which is of premier importance as the star attraction, but rather to the musical interpretation presented with the film in some of these theaters.

Most of these houses change their programs on Monday, Thursday, and on those days the manager and his assistants, together with the orchestra leader and his musicians, are on the job early in the morning. Rehearsal is called and the artists run through their acts. Stage and light cues are provided for, and everything is arranged for the afternoon performance, but what about the rehearsal of the star act—"the picture." What time and thought is given to this by the average manager?

In a discussion with a musical director in charge of an important circuit, he frankly stated that "if my musicians do not play the vaudeville right, the artists will kick, but nobody will kick for the picture; besides which few musicians who are experienced in playing vaudeville will not bother much with the picture."

Vaudeville managers, wake up! To stop your patrons from flocking to the exclusive movie theater your star act today is a feature film. But put it over right. Motion pictures are dumb, but music can make them speak. It can interpret and enhance every motion depicted on the screen. Get together with your musical director. Let him know you expect some effort from him. Help him financially by paying for some of the music. Consider the instrumentation of your orchestra. Listen to your own orchestra play a picture and then visit the exclusive picture house and see what they are doing. Your orchestra probably consists of piano, violin, cornet, trombone and drums. Sit on the right of the house and you have a charming melange of ear-reeking noise. The exclusive picture theater possibly has a string trio, a quartette with clarinet or cornet, or perhaps a quintette with an organ or harmonium. The atmosphere is different, the music is subdued. Each scene and change of action shows that some care has been exercised in the selection of the music. The orchestra plays the picture as an individual picture and give it a distinct interpretation, not a haphazard hit-or-miss continuation of melodies that at the best are distracting. It should not appear as though two distinct forms of entertainment were being given at the same time; viz.: a concert and a drama—one having scarcely any relation to the other. It is not good policy to run an entertainment on the three-ring circus basis. The music and the picture must work together. The picture is willing, so the music must co-operate. When two forces harmonize a certain satisfactory result is obtained.

Music gives to the film an atmosphere and enchantment which only experience can realize. By changing somewhat their combinations of musicians and if a little more care were given to the selection of music, their entertainment will take on more real value than before, and their audience will leave appreciating everything that has been offered for their entertainment.

Alice Brady, Multiple Star

Hard-Working Little Actress Appears in Many Features for World Film.

ALICE BRADY is the star of seven of the picture plays to be released by the World Film Corporation before the end of May, 1917. These are "Bought and Paid For," "A Woman Alone," "The Girl and the Wager," "Darkest Russia," "The Madness of Helen," "Sinners" and "Frou Frou."

At this rate of productivity as an actress Miss Brady is portraying one new role every month, which is regarded as something of a feat considering that the process covers a long stretch of time and is not operated under special pressure.

Alice Brady.

"Of course this is hard work," said Miss Brady. "Not in spots, but regularly, without the slightest break. I should call it inexorable, for its exertions are never relaxed. But it is wonderfully stimulating, for the variety is entirely unlimited, and you go from one role to another like roaming through some vast building with an endless number of rooms, all different and each one with something in it to fasten the interest.

"When I was very new to the speaking stage I realized that I lacked experience, and I thought the best way to acquire it was to join a stock company where they changed the bill every week. So I played all summer in Dayton, Ohio, appearing in a new role every Monday and beginning to rehearse another every Tuesday morning.

"This seemed to me to be great experience at the time, but as I look back I doubt if it was of any special benefit, excepting that it may have given me confidence and familiarity with the technical side of my profession. But as for any considerable help, the drive was too great and too aimless.

"The plays were changed so often that we scarcely knew one of them before we were plunging into another, and of course we fell into a rut in spite of ourselves. And then, if we were imperfect in our lines, we 'sensed' them as best we could, and slipped through somehow.

"This cannot be done in the pictures. One phrase may be made to do duty for another in the speaking drama, but you cannot make a substitute expression or action take the place of the real thing. In other words it is impossible to slur a scene or any portion of a scene in the pictures, because the camera is sure to catch you at it if you try.

"On account of this the picture player must be on his or her mettle all the time in order to succeed, which means that the interest is keyed up every instant. If this lets down the whole scene is gone and must be made over, which does not improve your own temper or those of the other actors and the director.

"This is what I meant by describing the work as inexorable. On the other hand, it is satisfying in a great many respects. For one thing the pictures give us opportunities to see ourselves as others see us, and incidentally to study our own imperfections. On the speaking stage we have to take the word of the critics or our friends regarding the value of our work. On the screen we have ample opportunity to judge for ourselves—so that if we do miss the applause there are other advantages which overbalance it immensely."

Enid Bennett Becomes Triangle-Kay Bee Star

RARELY has the initial work of a new film star aroused the interest that is being accorded the debut of Enid Bennett at the Triangle-Kay Bee studios in Los Angeles. Possessing all of the qualities considered essential in a screen favorite, Miss Bennett's success is predicted by impartial observers who have witnessed her opening scenes before the camera.

Little Miss Bennett is the special "find" of Thomas H. Ince, who was so impressed by her dramatic talent and photographic possibilities during his recent sojourn in New York that he urged her to return with him to California and become one of the stars of the Kay-Bee Company.

The far-away settlement of York, in Western Australia, is the birthplace of Miss Bennett. She is a blonde of the vivacious type with a clear, fresh coloring and wide blue eyes that poets are fond of describing as typical attributes of English beauty.

"It was through meeting Katherine Grey that I came to go on the stage," said Miss Bennett when asked about the incidents that affected her in choosing a career. "My friends gave me a theater party when I was sixteen. I was taken to Perth to see 'The Third Degree,' in which Miss Grey was then appearing. After the performance the star received me in her dressing-room, and was kind enough to help me secure an engagement as Modesty in 'Everywoman' within a few days. My work attracted the attention of Fred Niblo and Josephine Cohan and I became an ingenue in their company, appearing in 'Seven Keys to Baldpate,' 'The Fortune Hunter,' 'The Whip,' 'Excuse Me,' 'Broadway Jones' and other plays in their repertory.

"I feel that the most fortunate incident in my life, however, will prove to be my meeting with Mr. Ince in New York last summer, as I think motion picture acting is perfectly thrilling, and I am very eager to make good all the confidence that has been placed in me."

Enid Bennett.

POLI MEN SEE CHAPLIN REVUE.

Manager H. H. Buxbaum of the Twenty-third Street General Film Exchange entertained last week a quartet of Poli chiefs, General Manager R. C. Miller, W. L. Saunders of Bridgeport, O. C. Edwards of New Haven and A. Vanni of Hartford. The four were in town to take in an advance showing of the Essanay Chaplin revue of 1916. Others who during the same day looked upon this bunch of laughs were Mr. Graves of the Proctor forces and Messrs. Mitchell and Burnstein of the Loew circuit.

1916 MODEL MOTIOPHOTOGRAPH, USED IN ALASKA.

D. Nicoll, of Ketchikan, Alaska, paid the Motiograph factory a visit on his tour through the States. He praised the Motiograph very highly having used it for several years with entire satisfaction. He also ordered a 1916 model, to be shipped to his Dream theater, Ketchikan, Alaska.

Musical Suggestions for "The Brand of Cowardice."

Compiled by S. M. Berg.

Released by Metro Pictures Corp.

THIS "Musical Suggestion Cue Sheet" is not designed to solve every possible musical requirement of the film, but is intended as a partial solution of the problem—what to play for the picture. It has proven to be of great assistance to the leader, not only by relieving to a degree the tedium of rehearsals, but by assisting materially in overcoming those conditions encountered when the film is not available until the hour of performance.

The time indications will help the leader to anticipate the various cases which may consist of the printed sub-title (marked T) or a described action (marked D). For instance: 32¼ T—"Idiqui a Mexican" is a sub-title and is printed reading matter on the screen. But 33 D—"Child falls down cliff" is a description of action.

Cyril Van Cortland, wealthy young bachelor, is engaged to Marcia West, daughter of Col. West of the U. S. A. While at a party, news is received that the National Guard of which Cyril is a member, is ordered to the border, because of trouble with the Mexicans. Due to his love for all the luxuries of life, Cyril resigns his commission and is termed a coward by all present, besides which his engagement is broken by Marcia. To prove he is not a coward, he secretly enlists and through his heroic efforts, later rescues Marcia from the hands of the Mexicans.

The character of this picture is a Modern Drama wound around the ordering of the National Guard to Mexico with short scenes of fighting between the Mexicans and the Americans.

"Acoustics."

By S. M. Berg.

In "The New York Times" of Tuesday, October the 17th, appears a very interesting review upon the "Ballet Russe giving 'Sadko' as its Prelere." To quote the closing paragraph: "A record of the prelere would not be complete without a word in appreciation of the orchestra. Again the Diaghileff Ballet has shown its careful attention to the musical side of its work and has gathered a body of orchestral players which is something more than merely competent. No doubt the hall had something to do with this, for somehow the Manhattan Opera House seems the best setting in which the ballet has yet been displayed. Its acoustic properties are especially good."

Acoustics is one of the most difficult problems to be met with in a large building of any kind especially orchestra acoustics in a theater. When architects are called to design a theater no guarantee can ever be given that the acoustic properties will be perfect. I recall some years ago when a large new hall was constructed for the purpose of symphonic concerts, though the opening had been announced and the orchestra had rehearsed elsewhere. Owing to the incompleteness of the hall, temporary seats had to be installed as the performance had to be given, but which turned out to be a positive failure. Critics had condemned the organization and disaster seemed apparent when someone a little more intelligent than the rest, suggested investigating the acoustics of the new building. Experts were called and by a series of draperies and wire stringing, it was ultimately overcome.

The modern design of theater having no second balcony gives to the side of a house a long blank sweep which has a peculiar habit of throwing sounds backwards and forwards. Perhaps my readers have at some time attended a theater wherein a traveling company is performing, and while one of the actors, who is standing close to the footlights, is speaking his lines, an echo is suddenly noticed. Theater Managers certainly should give some consideration to this subject.

Two theaters may be built, in different districts but exactly from the same plans, and yet the acoustics of one may be perfect and the other faulty. An orchestra may play in one house and perfect tonal qualities are noticeable. The same performance in a second house seems blarney and distressing. Where such points arise, here are some remedies.

Frequently a theater orchestra is seated on a concrete floor and at their side is a series of iron doors. For such a problem a thin layer of asbestos, where fireproof conditions are met with, covering the iron doors will be found practical, and will have the beneficial effect. Again the solution is to raise the floor of the pit where the stringed and wood instruments are seated, sinking somewhat the brass and percussion. On a large expanse of blank wall, a tapestry hanging or a drop curtain often improves the acoustics, thus eliminating the echo.

In one instance I heard of, wherein there was an unusually large dome with ceiling lights to the theater, a good deal of trouble was caused by an echo which was overcome by suspending a series of drop lights with silken cords from the ceiling. Only a few weeks ago a theater in New York placed their orchestra upon a stage and upon the opening day the manager complained that one-half of the tone was lost, but on investigation it was found that the whole of the roof of the stage to the grid was open. A ceiling cloth was hung and the whole of the set covered in from the back, which immediately remedied the trouble.

Dr. Theodore Baker tells us that acoustics is the science of the properties and relations of sounds. A tone of sustained equal pitch is regulated by regular and constant vibrations of the air, whereas noise is caused by irregular and fluctuating vibrations. For example, were we to take any wind instrument and dent or bore a hole in a vital spot, the result would be a wretched performance by the musician, and the effect would be noise instead of tone.

Perfect tonal qualities depend upon the acoustic properties of the whole theater. As previously stated no guarantee of this kind can be made, but considerable help can be found in carefully changing the seating arrangement of musicians and by judicious help of a few strings, wires, cards, or a series of small draperies.

Real Thrills in Battle Pictures

Donald Thompson, War Photographer, Lectures at Private Showing of Ten Reels of War Scenes.

THE experiences of Donald C. Thompson, staff photographer for Leslie's Weekly, on the European battlefields, as caught by the motion picture camera, were given a private showing at Wurlitzer Hall, New York City, Sunday evening, October 22. Mr. Thompson was present in person and added to the interest of the occasion by his terse and lucid comments during the unwinding of the reels. The audience was composed of motion picture reviewers and other representatives of the press, and many of the scenes were greeted with hearty applause. Ten reels were shown, including two reels of hospital scenes that are not given in public.

The most impressive feature of Mr. Thompson's pictures is their authenticity. Nothing is faked. The photographer was under fire repeatedly, and scene after scene was taken at the risk of his life. Opening with some remarkable views taken from an aeroplane at a height of ten thousand feet above the harbor of Salonika, with the Allied fleet at anchor, the reels disclosed a battle between French and German aeroplanes, taken from a French machine; the "curtain of fire," which cut off retreat from the trenches and drove their occupants to surrender; a front line battle where the opposing trenches were only forty feet apart; an English dirigible rising from its place of concealment in the hold of a ship, and other vivid scenes taken at Verdun, Fleurcourt and on the Somme.

One of the most impressive incidents is the complete obliteration of a portion of a trench and a number of soldiers by a shell. The men are seen hurling hand grenades in the direction of the enemy. The next instant the shell strikes squarely in the center of their ranks, the air is filled with flying debris, and nothing remains but a gaping hole in the ground.

The hospital scenes reveal the terrible suffering and marvelous powers of endurance of the wounded men. One Algerian, in particular, received a round of applause from the spectators in recognition of the confident smile with which he greeted the surgeons when they started to dress his wound.

In the course of his remarks Mr. Thompson said that 70 per cent. of the film that he has taken of the European battlefields is still in France, and will be held there by the authorities until after the war. The 30 per cent. brought to this country contains positive proof that the man who made the pictures never let any obstacle or danger stand in his way.

Two Prize Winners on Selznick Program

Miss Zintheo and Miss Marton Are Chosen from the Eleven Leaders in Recent Contest.

TWO of the eleven winners of the national "beauty and brains" contest conducted by the Photoplay Magazine have been engaged on three-year contracts by Lewis J. Selznick. They are Miss Lucille Zintheo of Spokane and Miss Aletia Marton of Dallas.

The eleven winners of the contest, which was conducted for the purpose of selecting the prettiest and cleverest girl aspirant for laurels as a motion picture actress, in each section of the United States, were escorted recently to New York where the various film companies tested their abilities and made selections. First choice was naturally given Mr. Selznick, as one of the prime movers in the contest, and after film tests of all the girls were taken by Albert Capellani and Herbert Brenon, the decision was made.

Miss Zintheo is a brunette with remarkably expressive eyes and a brilliant smile. She is a native of Detroit, having been born there twenty-one years ago. She is making her first screen appearance in a minor part of "War Brides."

Miss Marton is a blonde. She is a native of Dallas. Her photograph has appeared extensively in the newspapers of the Southwest, and when the announcement of her success in the contest was made in the Dallas papers, she was tendered receptions and dinners. Miss Marton will make her screen debut in a screen version of the drama "Panthea."

Arcraft Issuing Much Publicity

Included in the List Are a Monograph by Wells Hawks, Ten Styles of Posters, Press Book and Lobby Display.

ONE of the most comprehensive lines of publicity assistance ever devised for a motion picture production is the claim made by Arcraft Pictures Corporation for the campaign which goes with the release of Mary Pickford in "Less Than the Dust" on November 6. Not only has every detail of the routine and recognized methods of co-operating with the exhibitor been carefully attended to, but several interesting and unusual business-getting novelties have been included in the campaign.

The "special" which is expected to create the most favorable comment is the little volume, "How to Handle Mary Pickford Pictures," written by Wells Hawks. In fact, this booklet is so highly regarded as a genuine monograph on the subject of how to improve presentation of motion pictures that Arcraft has ordered a generous supply for general distribution to exhibitors, whether showing the new superior productions of Mary Pickford or not.

The printing gives the exhibitor a choice of ten artistic styles for billboard advertising. Four styles are stock posters, showing Mary Pickford in new straight poses; the other six comprise the special printing ordered for "Less Than the Dust." Many exhibitors have ordered the stock posters, consisting of one one-sheet, two three-sheet and a twenty-four-sheet, for their preliminary campaign, planning subsequently to cover these boards with the special production printing, of which there are two styles each of one and three sheets and also one six and one twenty-four sheet.

More than thirty different styles of still photographs and character poses of Mary Pickford are used in the lobby displays designed for Arcraft exhibitors. An artistic herald, atmospheric slides and the usual cuts and the like are also available.

The note of novelty in the lobby displays is provided by numerous oil paintings made for Arcraft by well-known artists. Several character poses are available on easy rental terms. In addition there are oil paintings of Mary Pickford in straight new poses, which are being obtained by exhibitors as permanent display in their theaters. The mailing lists have been well taken care of with fine reproductions of these expensive oils on small cards.

Completing the co-operating scheme between Arcraft and exhibitor is the press book. There is everything required for newspaper publicity in the twenty-four pages of this volume. Filler paragraphs grow into column special stories for the feature sections. There is a catalog of cuts and numerous sample advertisements, one of which is furnished free in matrix form for the advertiser who uses large space. The book also contains a complete list of accessories and sample order blank for placing orders with the exchange managers.

INDUSTRIAL FILMS CIRCULATED BY Y. M. C. A.

It may not be generally known that the International Committee of Young Men's Christian Associations maintain as an important part of their service an Industrial Bureau which now has placed at its service more than two hundred different industrial films. These have been donated to the work of the Y. M. C. A. by various manufacturers.

The circulation of film by the Industrial Department of the International Committee has been under way since 1912, and was established for the purpose of supplying a weekly service to local branches of the Y. M. C. A., which in turn offer the use of these films free to schools, churches and other institutions in their respective localities. We understand that at least seven hundred of the Y. M. C. A. buildings throughout the country are equipped with all projection necessities. The work of the Y. M. C. A. in this respect is far-reaching, and an endeavor is now being made, in answer to a request, to supply the National Committee of the Y. M. C. A. in China with 300,000 feet of industrial film.

INTERNATIONAL SUBJECTS AT WALDORF.

For the first time in its history the guests at the Waldorf-Astoria in New York will be entertained on election night with a moving picture performance, instead of receiving the election returns to the accompaniment of a cabaret.

Because of its varied attractive features, the International was selected by the management of the Waldorf to furnish the entire evening's entertainment. The program will include the current issues of the Hearst International News Pictorial, one of the episodes of "Beatrice Fairfax," the current animated cartoons of George MacManus, Tom Powers and other International cartoonists; a comedy feature and the current issues of fashions, in which prominent Broadway stars pose.

Musical Setting for "The Devil's Prize."

Released by The Greater Vitagraph.

Musical Suggestions by S. M. Berg.

THIS "Musical Suggestion Cue Sheet" is not designed to solve every possible musical requirement of the film, but is intended as a partial solution of the problem—what to play for the picture. It has proven to be of great assistance to the leader, not only by relieving to a degree the tedium of rehearsals, but by assisting materially in overcoming those conditions encountered when the film is not available until the hour of performance.

Musical Suggestion Cue Sheets can be obtained (free of charge) by managers from their local exchange in advance of the date of release, and a sufficient number should be secured to provide one for each member of the orchestra. This will afford to the progressive leader an opportunity to acquaint himself with the general character of the film drama he is to portray with his orchestra.

Together with the suggested music at the title or descriptive cues where it is to be played, the tempo or characteristic is given so that the leader can select or substitute any or all of the numbers from his own library, thereby avoiding any financial outlay though still carrying out the interpretation.

The timing of the picture is based on a speed of 15 minutes to a thousand feet. The time indications will help the leader to anticipate the various cues which may consist of the printed sub-title (marked T) or a described action (marked D). For instance: 38½ T "The day of the sale" is a sub-title and is printed reading matter on the screen. But 69 D, "When Arnold dies," is a description of action.

Arnold St. Clair, brilliant and wealthy through his marriage to Adeline Stratton, sacrifices everything to obtain his own ends. Forced by his wife's uncle, he persuades Hugh Rowland, a newspaper owner, to boost some mining stock, which results in the poor miner losing their investments. In further scheming to cover his misdeeds, he murders Mark Stratton, then trying to place the blame on another. After a series of dramatic incidents, just as he is about to be arrested, death overtakes him.

The character of this picture is an intensely dramatic modern Society Drama. The music for this picture should be subdued at all times so as to enhance the dramatic and tense situations.

Note particularly: Piano only according to action at 6.
The required THEME to interpret this picture must be dramatic in character, so Irene Berg's "Dramatic Andante No. 32" is suggested. Time schedule—71 minutes (5 reels—about 4,750 feet).

Tempo.

By S. M. Berg.

Every musical composition is always marked in some form or other with the speed at which it should be performed. When a composer writes a number he has in mind the way he desires it to be rendered. Musicians, however, do not always give a serious thought to this problem, or note with sufficient care, the marked tempo.

The word Tempo is Italian. In German, Zeitmass, meaning rate of speed, movement, time, measure or beat. A Tempo or Tempo Primo—return to the original tempo; Tempo alla breve—half tempo; Tempo comodo—at a convenient pace; Tempo debole—weak beat; Tempo forte—strong beat; Tempo giusto—strict tempo; Tempo perduto—irregular, unsteady tempo; Tempo primo—as first tempo; Tempo ternario—triple time.

Tempo-mark. A word or phrase indicating the pace or speed of a movement and thus establishing the absolute time-value of the notes—Generally accepted tempo-marks were hardly known before the beginning of the 17th century, and were used sparingly until the 18th.—There are 3 classes; (1) indicating a steady rate of speed; (2) indicating acceleration; (3) indicating a slackening of the pace.—They do not in themselves indicate a fixed and positive rate of speed, but only the general character of the movement; consequently, for the sake of precision, a metronome mark is often added to the tempo-mark. Furthermore, various qualifying words are added

This question of Tempo is of more necessity to the Moving Picture Player, than to any other class of musician. I have always advocated in these columns that license should be allowed in the broadness of the interpretation of tempo, so as to carefully follow the action of the picture. But it is in the rendering of compositions suggested in what might be aptly described as the neutral scenes that more care of tempo should be taken.

As an instance of carelessness on behalf of the leader, a few nights ago, at a theater, the scene called for a Misterioso which the leader started to play. It happened to be the Pizzicato Misterioso No. 30 from Berg's Incidental Series, composed by Adolf Minot. The tempo-marking being Moderato 2/4, strings, of course being Pizzicato. The leader, however, took it at allegro, the consequences being that the strings were unable to play the number at such a rapid speed, so that the whole desired effect of mystery was lost.

Take, for example, that well-known composition by Victor Herbert, "Badinage." Here is a composition which, under my impression, is a test of any orchestra's or director's ability, because so much can be added to the composition by carefully following the composer's markings and tempos.

Characteristic numbers are another stumbling block for musicians. A Metronome is not a very expensive outlay, and a little study given to one will doubly repay any musician in grasping by a momentary glance the tempo markings on music, and he will also find that his ability to read at first sight will be greatly improved.

Careful attention to marks of expression and tempo is but a further requirement in the make-up of a musician, earnestly striving to interpret the emotions of the film.

Increased Demand for Our Productions

Fully 60 Per Cent. of Productions Shown in Great Britain Are of American Make—Higher Import Duties Fail to Affect Market.

CONSUL C. M. HITCH, Nottingham, England, writes in "Commerce Reports" that American photoplays are popular throughout the United Kingdom. Fully 60 per cent. of the pictures shown here are of American manufacture, and the demand appears to be steadily increasing. The balance of the films shown appear to be chiefly British, French and Italian.

The prices on films released for the open market—those which may be shown at more than one place at the same time—range from $30 per 1,000 feet for the first three days of their release to $1.25 per 1,000 feet after they have been in use for a few months. Those for which exclusive rights to exhibit have been granted bring from $25 to $250 per week, a fair average being $30 per 1,000 feet for three days.

There has been considerable agitation in the press in favor of limiting film imports into this country. It was thought for a time that the recent imposition of a customs duty of two-thirds cent per foot on blank films, 2 cents per foot on positive films, and 10 cents per foot on negative films would have a tendency to lessen the imports, but so far there has been no apparent diminution in the demand for foreign films.

Picture houses are well patronized in all sections of Great Britain, although the average price of admission is somewhat higher than in the United States. The prices outside of London generally range from 3d. (6 cents) to 1s. (24 cents), with an additional war tax, which came into force on May 15, 1916, and which varies according to the price of admission. Where the admission exceeds 2d (4 cents), but does not exceed 6d. (12 cents), the tax is 1d. (2 cents). Where it exceeds 6d. (12 cents), but does not exceed 2s. 6d. (60 cents), the tax is 2d (4 cents). This tax is always added to the cost of the ticket, and is paid by the public.

American films are usually imported through Liverpool or Southampton, and prices are quoted f. o. b. New York. The usual terms of sale, when American firms are selling to agents in London, are cash against documents, with a discount varying from 2½ to 10 per cent. The common terms between English distributors and renters are cash against weekly invoices. To secure a footing in this market it is advisable to open a branch, or grant agency rights to some established firm. All the American film companies doing business in Great Britain have recognized this requirement.

As London is the chief distributing center, it would be advisable to establish a branch or agency there, for the amount of business to be done in Nottingham and district would hardly warrant the location of a general agency here.

The present demand appears to be chiefly for films produced from the stories of prominent writers, particularly one-reel and two-reel dramas, with a leaning toward romance. This is attributed to the fact that most of the picture houses throughout this country are a present patronized largely by women and children. Apparently there is a good opening for the production of films illustrating American cities and life and reviews of current events, but there is no demand for war dramas, nor is any expected for some time.

Honduras Theaters Show Foreign Films

But American Subjects Are Popular—High Cost of Rental Precludes Use of Our Pictures.

THERE is not a playhouse for the spoken drama on the north coast of Honduras, and in the Ceiba consular district the only public amusements are motion picture shows, of which there are two, one in Ceiba, the other in Tela, says Consul Francis J. Dyer at Ceiba in "Commerce Reports." The house in Ceiba gives three shows a week—Thursday, Saturday and Sundays.

Both of these houses secure their films from Guatemala City. The Ceiba theater presents from 5,000 to 8,000 feet of film at each performance—French and Italian, and occasionally one from the United States; in the latter case usually a "wild west" film with cowboys and Indians, always popular with local audiences and provocative of boisterous applause. All comic and western films go well here. The foreign films are frequently of the society-drama type, which are less favored.

The Tivoli theater in Ceiba seats 1,000. The entire front of the frame structure is occupied by the "cantina," where soft drinks, beer, wines and liquors are served, as well as sandwiches. On the first presentation of a film the admission prices are 1.25, 1 and 0.50 pesos, local currency, equivalent in United States gold to 51.25, 41 and 20.5 cents. On the second presentation of a film the scale of admission is 1, 0.75 and 0.25 peso (41, 30.75 and 10.25 cents). When the lower scale prevails the house is often filled to capacity.

Usually the show begins at 8 o'clock and lasts until 11, with an intermission, which gives an opportunity to visit the "cantina," although drinks are served to patrons in their seats. Outside several little carts dispense popcorn, which meets with a ready sale, and the street vendors also sell native cakes and sweetmeats and "frescos," or cool drinks, consisting mostly of shaved ice and fruit syrup. The local American population contributes but little to the attendance.

Expenses are comparatively heavy. Frequently the box office receipts do not meet them, but the bar makes up the deficiency. The cost of the films is $18 gold a night. The proprietor (J. Figols) says that if he obtained his films from the United States they would cost him $23 a night, but he has had an offer from the Cuban office of an American concern to supply him with films for a period of three months at 1 cent per foot. As his contract for the Guatemala films has six months to run, he has not been able to close with this offer.

Dr. R. H. Wilson is lessee of the theater in Tela, which seats 400 persons and does a good business one night a week. Formerly it gave four shows a week, but now it is open only on Sundays. Like the Tivoli theater, in Ceiba, it is on the Guatemala circuit, and therefore it has to use French and Italian films, although the American films are more popular. The price paid is $4 per 1,000 feet for 30 days.

Dr. Wilson has been in negotiation with the manager of the cinematograph in San Pedro Sula for the use of that theater's films, which are procured from the United States, but the best terms offered him, he says, are 50 per cent. of the gross receipts. The Tela theater presents 8,000 feet of film at a performance which lasts an hour and a half, and the admission price is 1, 0.50 and 0.25 peso (41, 20.5 and 10.25 cents). There is no duty on rented films.

"LUMBERLANDS" OPENS IN THE CHIEF CITIES.

In many of the best theaters of the large cities of the country Helen Holmes' new fifteen chapter thrill picture, "A Lass of the Lumberlands," had its first chapter showing Monday, October 23, and managers report it was given "a critical and flattering reception." The Pantages Circuit of vaudeville and moving picture houses opened its Minneapolis theater Saturday, October 28, with "A Lass of the Lumberlands." This opening marks "the farthest East" movement of Pantages entertainment.

The time indications will help the leader to anticipate the various cues which may consist of the printed sub-title (marked T) or a described action (marked D). For instance: 22½ T "Sir, my husband is very ill" is a sub-title and is printed reading matter on the screen. But 18½ D "At end of song" is a description of action.

Van Dyke Tarleton, an erratic artist, lacking a model with satanic qualities, leaves for the West with his beautiful wife Naomi. In Tophet, a "tough" border town, he meets "Bowie" Blake, a one-time outlaw, whom he recognizes as just the man for his painting. Through the persuasive efforts of Naomi, whom Blake has learned to love, he becomes her husband's model, but, taunted by the insulting words of Van Dyke to his wife, leaves them. Later, regretting his action, he returns in time to save Naomi from the hands of bandits who have already killed her husband, and the picture closes with the future uplifting of "Bowie" Blake.

The character of this picture is a strong dramatic offering, where heavy, subdued music will be found necessary for the interpretation.

The THEME selected, "Dramatic Tension No. 9"—Andino, will be found to have the characteristics depicting the regeneration of a bad man by the love of a good woman.

Note particularly: Horses' hoofs' effects throughout picture. Short flash of dancing in a Western border dance hall at 7½; organ only according to action (direct cue) of "Love's Old Sweet Song" at 15; shots at 26½, 40 and 57½; fire effects at 44½.

Music Must Be Subordinated to the Picture.

By S. M. Berg.

At the Broadway Theater on October 19, there was presented a special showing of the Metro Pictures Corporation's production of "Romeo and Juliet." Accompanying the picture was a Musical Setting of which I had the honor of synchronizing, and Irene Berge co-operated with me in the arranging. For this occasion the Broadway Theatre Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. James (Jimmie) Bradford, was considerably augmented, and the film, together with its musical setting, was exhibited to the press and invited guests.

A few days elapsed and at a private showing of a feature picture I encountered a well-known press representative who when I asked him "what he thought of 'Romeo and Juliet'" replied, "a wonderful picture." My further interrogation was "what about the music," and brought forth the reply, "Really, I didn't notice it." As the words passed this jovial person's lips he suddenly realized he was talking to the man who had been responsible for the musical setting, and possibly some apologetic phrase was forming in his mind when I replied: "Many kind words of appreciation have been made upon the musical interpretation of 'Romeo and Juliet,' but it is left to you to unconsciously express the highest form of appreciation yet given it."

Music must and should be subordinated to the picture. Patrons go to a moving picture theater to see pictures. Music is the addition to the picture which turns "silent drama" into "speaking drama." It can and must interpret every emotion, just like the gifted orator plays upon the heartstrings of his audience and moves them from laughter to tears, so should the music intensify and brighten the changing emotions of the screen action. Musicians and managers must realize that the greatest compliment that can be paid a performance in a theater is to hear the departing audience express themselves on the beauties of the picture, entirely forgetting the merits of the music presented.

What percentage of an audience will speak of the projection if it is perfect? But if it is bad, they will complain. They justifiably demand service which covers every adjunct in the theatre presented with the film.

Visit an art gallery and you will possibly notice a crowd standing in silent admiration in front of some artist's masterpiece. Notice the frame which surrounds the picture. It is almost a certainty that such care and thought has been exhibited in the selection of a harmonious design to enshrine the masterpiece. It lends beauty and finish to the painting, but no one admires gives thought to the purpose of the frame.

In the new wave that is spreading over the country for better musical interpretation for the motion picture, a great deal of care should be taken to sufficiently curb the enthusiasm and to judiciously restrain the music that shall appropriately interpret the film.

Harmo-Electric Pipe Organ.

LAST year I described at some length a pipe-organ played from a piano keyboard to which it was electrically connected. Some time ago when this instrument was described to a Chicago organist he remarked: "Oh! That's a tubular organ; those tubular organs are not real pipe-organs." He hadn't seen the Harmo-Electric and took it for granted that the instrument was "only a tubular organ." Now I don't know whether or not this impression was held by other organists; but if so I wish to set them right. The Harmo-Electric is not a tubular organ. Its pipes do not contain reeds. They are genuine organ pipes, made by one of the best organ pipe manufacturers in this country, and are made with the same careful attention as are those intended for the best church organs. The principal difference between this instrument and the church organ is that the Harmo-Electric is attached (or connected) electrically to a piano keyboard, while a church organ has one, two or more keyboards (manuals). A piano keyboard is a little longer than that of the organ, but otherwise—as a keyboard—it is the same thing. Like all organs, the Harmo-Electric presents a slight difference of touch to that of the piano, otherwise an ordinary good pianist will find no real difficulties to overcome in mastering this instrument. Mr. Henri Keates (who is one of Chicago's best moving picture organists) was at the factory on the day I looked at the Harmo-Electric, and he told me any pianist could handle it with a few hours' practice. Mr. Keates seemed quite enthusiastic over this musical innovation. He is playing at the De Luxe theater—a beautiful picture house on Chicago's North Side—which contains an excellent pipe-organ. Mr. Keates said he could "do anything on the Harmo-Electric that could be done on the pipe-organ." He meant, of course, that he could produce the same effect on the one as upon the other; and judging from what I saw and heard, I believe he could.

The length of keyboard is the same as in all organs—sixty-one notes. The adjustment is so perfect that when a note is struck the organ response is as sharp and quick as the action of a piano; quicker, if such a thing is possible. Rapid, staccato playing is entirely practicable, and even if one wishes to deprecate this noble instrument with "rag time," there are no mechanical difficulties in the way.

One of the new developments is a method of connecting either the upper or lower half of any set of pipes at will. This provides a good working substitute for the double keyboard (or "two manuals"). An illustration will make this more clear to the uninitiated.

In the cut a piano keyboard is shown. The arrow in the middle shows where the division occurs. (That is, when you want to use the instrument in this manner.) On the right hand you can throw on any one of the four foot stops, its compass running from "F" in the middle octave upward to its highest note. On the left any eight foot stop can be connected, with a compass ranging from "E" middle octave, downward to its lowest note. This gives the performer a good practical range for solo and accompaniment work with two contrasting voices.

In operating an ordinary pipe organ, the performer—wishing to use a different voice for each, his solo and accompaniment—(say, flute and cello) will connect one of the stops with his upper manual, the other with his lower. In the economical substitute here offered by the Harmo-Electric, the player connects his flute stop to one side of his keyboard, the cello to the other, thus getting a combination which answers admirably for ordinary work.

You don't overlook this. You can have more keyboards if you want them, but they cost more. The Harmo-Electric people build organs too, and can supply your instruments with as many manuals as you care to pay for, but the point they are working on is this: To provide the exhibitor with the most satisfactory pipe-organ at the least possible expenditure. And this one item of substituting a divided keyboard for a double manual is a point of economy which more than compensates for the slight restriction of compass.

I said you could throw any one of the four foot stops on one side and any one of the eight foot on the other. As a matter of fact, you can throw on any number of stops (on either side) which you care to use at the time. This gives you a wealth of combination color only limited by the number of stops (sets of pipes) in the style you are using.

Like the most modern organs, the Harmo-Electric has "flappers" to throw off and on the different sets of pipes instead of the old-fashioned "stops" which pulled out and pushed in. These "flappers" all lie just above the performer's hands along the middle of the keyboard and are thrown on and off by an upward or downward stroke of the hand while playing.

Two things should appeal to exhibitors. One is the extreme simplicity of the instrument, the other is the short time required to install it in your house, or to take it down—in case you want to move to a bigger house.

Its simplicity of construction reduces to a minimum any chances of getting out of order. They tell me that once a Harmo-Electric is set up no further attention is required beyond keeping the piano in tune—and you have to do that anyway, even when you use only a piano. The Orpheum theater in South Omaha has had one of the smaller instruments in use for nearly two years and hasn't needed fixing once.

The new "Style E" can be set up in three days; the medium styles (those described last year) can be set up in one day. Either kind can be taken down in three hours. All the pipes are contained in big cases (sound chests) which are placed where most convenient. The organ does not need to be built in your theater.

A detail to which they have given much attention is the automatic player. This is worked through a perforated roll, of course, but with some new features. Here is a partial description as given to me. "The automatic stop-action is operated by air suction to electro-pneumatics and from there is air pressure which opens electro-pneumatics. This is operated by one hole in the perforated roll instead of two, as in other players. Its advantage lies in the saving of paper, tracker bar and other labor on the mechanical end—that is, when it makes and breaks the contact. Makes for durability and simplicity."

Another item is the octave coupler, which is only one and a half inches thick and three and a half inches in diameter.

Style E has eleven stops, including chimes and pedal. The pedal notes are, of course, operated by the feet, but there is a stop which connects these pipes to the keyboard, permitting them to be played by left hand if desirable. This will appeal to beginners.

The Kramer Organ Co. represents the Harmo-Electric in New York in their show rooms in the Film Building, 729 Seventh avenue, New York City.

PANCHO VILLA'S FAMILY PHOTOGRAPHED.

The immediate family and near relatives of Francisco Villa, the famous Mexican bandit and outlaw, have just been filmed for the first time by the International and will appear in the Hearst International News Pictorial. The most notable persons of the group are Mrs. Francisco Villa and her young son, Augustin Francisco, Jr., who is said to bear a strong resemblance to his notorious father. Next in importance come Hipolito Villa, Francisco's brother, his wife and baby, Maria Louisa, and Mrs. Antonio Villa, widow of the Villa brother, who was killed in battle. Others appearing in this interesting group are Mrs. Reynolds Martinez Villa, Gen. Caesar F. Moyia, Major Antonio Casteklanos, two notable Villista officers, and Prof. Matias Garcia, of the University of Chihuahua.

"A SHORT-SIGHTED CRIME"—(Tweedledum).

In "A Short-Sighted Crime," which will be released by Unity this week, Tweedledum is given a chance to be irresistibly funny and he lives up to his opportunities from beginning to end. The story is very modern, even though it depends for its fun upon two of our very oldest institutions, marriage and motherhood.

SPLENDID CAST FOR WALSH PICTURE.

A cast which is really superb has been assembled for William Fox's "The Island of Desire," released on December 18. Besides George Walsh, the star, there are such notable players as Anna Luther, Margaret Gibson, Herschel Mayall, William Burgess, William Clifford, Willard Louis, Hector Sarno and Samuel Searles. Otis Turner, who made "The Mediator," had charge of the direction. This is Miss Gibson's first appearance in Fox films.

"CONQUEST OF CANAAN" FOR THE COAST.

The De Luxe Film-Lasky Corporation of San Francisco have secured the Frohman production "Conquest of Canaan," taken from the novel by Booth Tarkington. This is their initial release, and as the reviews of and comments on this big six-reeler have expressed a most gratifying approval, this company is getting off to a good start.

Music for the Picture

Conducted by CLARENCE E. SINN and NORMAN STUCKEY.

Announcement.

THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD has engaged Norman Stuckey, a musician of wide experience, to edit, in conjunction with Clarence E. Sinn, the "Music for the Picture" department of this magazine.

Mr. Stuckey has had ten years' experience playing for moving pictures, as pianist, organist and orchestra director. He has also been connected with some of the largest theaters and hotels in this country. With his knowledge of music and practical experience in arranging music for the film, his articles should prove of exceptional interest to readers of the Moving Picture World.

Any questions concerning music for the film, suitable instrumentation for motion picture theaters, questions relating to the pipe organ; in fact, any questions, criticisms or suggestions dealing with musical interpretation for moving pictures will be answered by Mr. Stuckey through this department. Inquiries should be addressed to Musical Editor, Moving Picture World, 17 Madison Avenue, New York City.

The Importance of Tone Color in Relation to Musical Interpretation.

By Norman Stuckey.

The significance of tone color and its relation to interpreting the varied emotions on the screen is an important subject that should command the attention of every musician who is interested in securing the best musical results, whether from piano, organ or orchestra.

Character, emotional appeal and atmosphere are the chief things that we should consider when selecting a number to portray action. The two important materials of music must either be (1) fast or slow, (2) loud or soft. These are the main factors of emotional appeal.

In cataloging a music library to be used for depicting the screen action, every musician should have his music classified under the following titles: Characteristic, Descriptive, Andantes, Moderatos, Marches, Waltzes, Rags, Fox-trots, One-steps, Oriental, etc.

There is a new method of cataloging your music library which will prove more practical than the method used by many musicians and, as these are days of progress, it is hoped that the following suggestions will prove of value to the musician who endeavors to interpret pictures correctly.

There are often times when a mere suggestion as to a plaintive or an agitated number will not exactly portray the emotion on the screen. There are scenes of impending danger; scenes of despair, of longing, of rage, of humor, of mystery, of gloom and of terror. There are scenes requiring humorous or grotesque music. Often sacred and national music will be required.

A piece of music catalogued under the head of plaintive does not always fit the picture as a plaintive scene may be one of despair or longing. It is therefore suggested that another classification be prepared, one that adequately covers the demands of tone coloring, and a system that will lighten the labor of the musician who plays for moving pictures.

The various emotions can be summed up under the following titles: Agitation, Agony, Despair, Energy, Exultation, Mystery, Pathos, Response, Rage, Romance, Storm, Terror, Yearning, Pleading, etc.

The experienced musician knows that music of a minor nature portrays more accurately scenes of agitation, agony, despair, gloom, rage, storm, terror, than major music. These are scenes of longing, love, joy and romance that are better portrayed by major music.

The leader who takes the time to reclassify his catalog under the above emotions will be able to depict more accurately emotional scenes than if his library is classified in the usual manner.

Beethoven's music, more particularly than any other composer, is replete with emotional appeal. Movements from his symphonies can be described as follows: Six impassioned, two tragic, four sublime, five joyous, four peaceful, three sweet and charming, six cheerful and serene, eight wild and boisterous. A careful analysis of the nine symphonies will disclose the emotional movements above described.

Many of the standard overtures contain many tone pictures that fit the screen action well, but the difficulty with many overtures and selections, too, is the fact that certain movements are too short. They will bear repeating sometimes, but to repeat a movement more than once, unless used as a theme in different parts of the program, is not considered good judgment by experienced musicians playing for the film.

Suites are very practical for pictures, each number usually being long enough to carry out the action as desired. Many musicians who use suites lament the fact that there are not more published. The number of published suites is very limited at the present time. Often an entire suite can be played through and it will be found to fit the action perfectly, though many leaders find it more practical to play but one movement for a feature, reserving the others for future use.

Wagner was a past master in the use of music to depict human emotions. A close study of his operas will give the musician an insight into music and their importance in relation to portraying the language of emotion.

In the prelude to Act III. of "Tristan and Isolde," the slow, sustained music, low in pitch, wonderfully portrays an atmosphere of sickness and gloom.

The grand march from Tannhauser is an excellent example of tone color. Opening with the martial peal of trumpets, this number is characterized throughout by pomp and grandeur.

Better Results in Piano-Playing.

Many pianists form the habit of playing nothing but classical music. This is a mistake, as every program should be varied with a little popular music. There are many light intermezzos that are popular with an audience and now and then a popular song worked into a certain scene is effective.

It is best, though, to confine the playing of popular music strictly to comedy pictures, saving the better music for the dramas.

For scenic pictures a concert waltz played in a brilliant manner is pleasing. For comedy-cartoons a grotesque dance or lively rag is appropriate.

For weeklies requiring many changes of scene, a selection of marches, waltzes, dances and descriptive music is necessary.

Some pianists can memorize pieces easily and this is a great advantage when playing for pictures, but it is not absolutely necessary to memorize everything you play. Rather than play a number incorrectly, it would be better tact to play from the music. Unless absolutely sure of the fingering and phrasing, the pianist should never fail to play from music.

There are many pictures requiring improvisation. It is then an excellent plan for the pianist to know several numbers that he can play at once without referring to any music. For example, martial airs, church music and a number of waltzes, dances and marches are music that the pianist should memorize and have ready to play, should the occasion demand them.

Brevities.

William Furst, the well-known composer, prepared the musical setting for "Joan, the Woman," featuring Geraldine Farrar, which opened at the Forty-fourth Street theater on Christmas.

Musicians throughout the country will be glad to know that Carl Fischer is publishing another set of moving picture music containing forty-six numbers. The set includes: Characteristic numbers, Marches, Western music, Spanish, Indian, Chinese and Oriental numbers, as well as a liberal number of Agitateds, Hurries, Allegros, etc., for which there is always a constant demand.

William Fox is sending a number of companies of "A Daughter of the Gods" on tour. Theater musicians should not miss the opportunity of witnessing this artistic film masterpiece and every musician who is interested in appropriate music for the film should pay particular attention to the beautiful musical score which Robert Hood Bowers composed for this production.

Improvising (Part II).

ARTICLE I.

By Clarence E. Sinn.

PART I. of a series of letters on improvising for the pictures appeared in this department in issues of the Moving Picture World from November 13, 1915, to May 6, 1916, inclusive. It is not expedient to go over the ground again which is covered by those nine articles, some of the elementals found in the study of harmony, though occasionally one or more points will be reintroduced in another form for purposes of illustration. We must take it for granted that the interested reader knows the elements of a simple chord in its first form—that is, a triad—consisting of a tonic, a third and a fifth. This is illustrated in Articles VII. and VIII. (issues of March 25 and April 15). It is also surmised that the reader—if he be interested—has also an idea of the difference between major and minor keys, and wherein this difference lies. The matter of major and minor thirds (as well as major and minor keys) is also touched upon in the same two Articles (VII. and VIII.). These, however, are among the rudiments of the science of harmony and are taught fully in the textbooks of that study.

Elaborating upon a theme or subject is a different matter, and one which I believe can best be studied through a repetition of examples and illustrations—not necessarily the same, but upon similar lines.

Before going further I wish to refer the reader to Article VI. (issue of February 19, 1916) regarding the use of the words "theme" and "subject." Reasons are there given why it is thought advisable to give these words a meaning and distinction of their own (in these articles) regardless of usual definitions. Hence (for my own purposes) I shall define the words as follows:

Theme.—A melody or strain of music, or a complete musical idea capable of describing (or through improvising being made to describe) a certain scene or character. In other words, being musically appropriate to the scene or character.

Subject.—A group of notes, a measure, or a few measures—that is, an incomplete musical idea—from which a melody may be made. (This last is improvisation in its true sense, and includes composition to a large degree.)

The Theme (as above defined) will be the more interesting as well as of more practical value to the accompanist of moving pictures. It presents a complete musical idea ready made, which seems appropriate to his character, or scene, or to the story; and this idea may be made through elaboration (one form of improvising) to describe different emotions, thus giving his accompanist light and shade. Elaborate and intricate melodies do not lend themselves so readily to this work as the simple forms. They are themselves elaborations of simple themes, and much further elaboration (such as addition, subtraction or inversion) might destroy their identity, and to this extent, their value as a descriptive theme. Sometimes a few measures may be taken from such a composition, and used as a subject, upon which to build another melody. This will be taken up at another time, however. At present we will concern ourselves with the Theme in simple forms.

Usually the picture accompanist prefers to play a number which is more or less in keeping with the spirit of the picture, and as the character of the scenes change, introduce other musical numbers suitable to the varying moods of the story. This is perfectly correct, of course. It is the procedure followed by the better picture accompanists who play from notes. It is about the only satisfactory method which could be used by an orchestra. But a "one-man" accompanist (be he using the organ, piano or one of the "combination instruments") will find opportunities for effective use of the Theme which is denied the orchestra except when the music is specially written for the picture. Very few organists, or pianists, nowadays confine themselves to the printed page entirely, but have a number of melodies memorized which they introduce as their fancy or judgment dictates. It has been repeatedly stated that "it is not always what you play" that counts; the manner of playing has a great deal to do with it.

We all know the value of choosing some easily recognized melody as a "theme" to run throughout a picture, introducing it whenever it can be made most effective. Usually it is attached to one of the prominent characters and is used in that character's best (or most dramatic) scenes. This "Theme" can be made still more effective at times by changing the nature of the melody to fit the varying moods of the scene. As an illustration, let us look at an old song called "Long Ago." Example 1 gives this Theme in its original form. The nature of the music is suggestive of a tender, melancholy mood.

It is simple in structure, and therefore contains possibilities for elaboration. It is not best to twist a Theme out of all resemblance to its former self (although this is sometimes permissible when a flight of fancy leads you in that direction), but your best dramatic effects are generally obtained by presenting the same melody to your hearers in a different though still recognizable form. Example No. 2 suggests how this Theme may be given an air of gaiety by doubling up the tempo. To make variety, I have introduced three "auxiliary notes" (marked with a "v") in this example.

Example 1.

Example 2.

With the exception of this slight elaboration—if it can be called such—the melody in example No. 2 is identical with that of the original Theme. (Ex. 1.) The tempo is much accelerated, and that is about all. Though the character of the music is changed, the Theme is still easily recognizable, and might be very appropriate in the lighter scenes of the character to which the Theme is applied. (Meaning the Theme as shown in Example 1.)

Now let us look at Example 3. Here we have the same thing changed to a minor key. The melody sounds somewhat different, though it may still be recognized as our original Theme.

Slow.

Its character is sad—plaintive—almost dirge-like, in fact. With very little modification we have produced two widely variant characteristics from a given theme. By elaborating and more or less modifying this theme we can make it portray any emotion or action depicted upon the screen. These elaborations and modifications may be made through alteration of the figure, inversion, extension of intervals, etc., all of which were shown in former articles and will be illustrated from time to time.

Good Music as a Business Asset.

Norman Stuckey.

MANAGERS in small cities can improve business by giving more thought and attention to the musical part of their programs.

The time when a picture program alone was sufficient to satisfy an audience has passed, and today moving picture audiences are more exacting and are demanding more for their money, not only in quantity, but in quality.

As a rule the music is the last detail considered by many managers. They exert every effort in procuring the best pictures, the best projection, an attractive theater, everything in fact before the music, and this is thought of last. This is a grave mistake and managers should realize that an appropriate musical program well rendered by competent musicians is quite important and proves a real business asset.

How many managers feature their music or musicians? In many theaters throughout the country the shows are started without an overture. There are no singers to vary the program. It has been proved that a moving picture show is an incomplete entertainment without excellent music, instrumental and vocal.

A manager in a small town recently advertised "The best music and the best pictures." He could back this statement to the letter as he had first-class musicians and the best pictures procurable. He was willing to pay the price for music and he was more than repaid by increased patronage. Whether your music is an organ, an orchestra or a piano, it is every exhibitor's duty and interest to see that the highest standard is maintained. Many managers fail to give the music the attention it deserves because they know nothing of music. Many regard music as some regard a foreign language. It is the manager's duty to learn something of music, the important details if nothing more. He should know when his musician or musicians are playing appropriate music for the film, but he must base his knowledge on intelligent understanding of facts and conditions rather than jump at conclusions.

Aside from being willing to learn about this important phase of his business, the manager can overcome much difficulty by engaging competent musicians who thoroughly know the art of selecting and playing appropriate music for the screen. There are many reliable musicians who are conscientious in regard to their work and it is a wise manager who trusts the musical end of his business with a musician whose efforts prove satisfactory to an audience.

If the manager is unfortunate in engaging a careless, or unskilled musician, he should take drastic steps at once to remedy his trouble. Managers can quickly learn if their music is pleasing or displeasing to their patrons—by the consensus of opinion of his audience. What the majority agree upon is usually right, but managers should never believe the opinions of a few, as they may be prejudiced—one way or the other. There are many methods that can be used in getting better results from your musician or musicians the same as there are different methods for getting results from advertising.

It is only because managers consider the music last why there are not more ideas and suggestions made known relating to this important detail of the business. The Editor of this department will be glad to receive suggestions, programs and other matter regarding the musical phase of the motion picture theater.

While there are many musicians who are progressive and who always strive to improve their playing, many are confronted with many little obstacles that prevent them from becoming as efficient as they would like to be. It is the aim of this department to offer suggestions that will prove of help to the theater musician.

A visit to the large motion picture theaters in New York will convince any exhibitors the importance of music in connection with the film, and though his theater may not be a large one, it is possible to get better results from his music—results that mean increased patronage.

Better Results in Piano Playing.

To get the best results from piano playing for moving pictures it is highly essential that the pianist uses a piano that is in tune.

The real musician is particular in this respect and when the piano shows signs of being out of tune he immediately has it tuned and all necessary repairs made. One of the reasons for unsatisfactory musical interpretation, aside from the pianist being unskilled, is an instrument with a poor quality of tone.

The manager who makes his music a feature should satisfy himself that his piano is a first class instrument and he should engage a tuner to call at least once a month to tune and regulate it.

Many managers make arrangements with tuners to call regularly, getting a flat rate for a certain number of tunings a year. Musicians and managers should pay particular attention to this important detail, for aside from a piano being poorly played there is nothing worse to a discriminating audience than a piano badly out of tune.

Music Every Musician Should Know.

SONG OF THE VOLGA BOATMEN.

This number is distinctly Russian in treatment, the melody founded upon an old Russian tune. It is of minor character and suggests the flowing of the river Volga and then the start of the voyage of the boatman who sings his song as his little vessel disappears down the river.

SERENADE—Pierne.

In this Serenade, Pierne has given the work a true song-like character. The rhythm of the accompaniment (left hand), which is carried through the piece, is exactly that of the Polonaise, and will be found in Chopin's "Military Polonaise," but here it is used in a softer and daintier fashion, and lacks the fire and passion of the stately Polish dance. The phrases are clean-cut enough in style, but are extended and altered here and there in a way that causes the most pleasing variety of effect.

RACKOCZY MARCH—Liszt.

This number was originally a true Gypsy piece written by Michael Barna, leader of the Gypsies, and court violinist to Prince Franz

Rakoczy II, who lived from 1676 to 1735. The piece has become of national significance and has been for many years a sort of Hungarian Marseillaise. Berlioz has set this march in his "Damnation of Faust" and Liszt's version is much the same, being built mostly of the true "Rakoczy Song," but having some of Ruzsitska's battle music also.

The march is played loud nearly all through, marked and with as much fire as possible. The real march begins after the first six bars of introduction, and consists of a 16-bar period (8 bars repeated), 10 measures of episode, and 11 of somewhat altered period. The trio has a 10-bar period. Care must be used in shading this number.

New Publications.

ONE HUNDRED ENGLISH FOLKSONGS—The songs are all recently collected by the editor, Cecil J. Sharp, from the lips of folk-singers themselves, and demonstrate the unsuspected wealth of melodies—strongly racial, picturesque and expressive—which has been handed down among the people of England. The editor's masterly accompaniments preserve to perfection the character of the songs, and are at the same time a delight to the musician requiring this character of music for interpreting moving pictures. $1.50. Published by C. H. Ditson, New York.

SIXTY FOLKSONGS OF FRANCE—Edited by Julien Tiersot. These songs prove that France need yield to no nation in respect to the abundance, variety and vitality of her folk-songs. The editor, who is librarian at the Paris Conservatory, has made a most catholic and judicious selection. An illuminating essay and individual notes to each song preface the volume. $1.50. Published by C. H. Ditson, New York.

ONE HUNDRED FOLKSONGS OF ALL NATIONS—Edited by Granville Bantock. The editor of this volume has drawn on the treasures of folk-songs of every nation in Europe, various races in Asia, Africa and America, making it by far the most valuable collection in the English language. The thoughtful introduction and the brief scholarly notes add to the interest of the volume. The accompaniments are interesting and musicianly. This volume should be included in the library of every musician who endeavors to interpret pictures correctly. $1.50. Published by C. H. Ditson, New York.

Dream Pictures by Wilmot Lemont.

Oliver Ditson Company publish an album of Dream Pictures by Wilmot Lemont which should be included in every musician's library who is striving to play appropriate music for motion pictures. The pieces are arranged for piano, Grade III-IV, in difficulty, but can be easily adapted for the organ. The volume contains nine different pieces:

1. Lotus Bloom, 4-4 Andantino in A Flat.
2. The Dancers, 4-4 Moderato in A.
3. At Eventide, 4-4 Andante in B Flat.
4. Reverie D'Amour, 2-4 Moderato in G Flat.
5. Serenade Mexicaine, 3-8 in A.
6. The Nautch Girl, 3-4 Moderato in E Flat Minor.
7. To My Valentine, 2-4 Moderato. 2-4 in E Flat. Con Moto.
8. The Caress, 4-4 Andante in D Flat.
9. Valse Intermezzo, 3-4 in A Flat. Tempo Rubato.

Each piece is arranged and carefully fingered. The volume is printed on heavy paper, concert size. For the pianist or organist who specializes in music that please the public's fancy, this collection of Dream Pictures is indispensable.

Special Musical Score for New Pickford Play.

Particular care has been devoted to the musical setting of the new Mary Pickford production, "The Pride of the Clan," released by Arcraft. For this work the Arcraft Corporation engaged the services of William C. Stickles of the firm of George W. Benyon, Inc., pioneers in the preparation of musical scores for motion pictures.

One of the features of the musical accompaniment for "The Pride of the Clan" will be displayed in the fact that the entire score can be presented as a piano solo. The piano sheets in such musical scores of the past have never, in themselves, presented a comprehensive accompaniment for the picture. "The Pride of the Clan" piano score will offer a distinct departure from the usual motion picture in that it forms a perfect accompaniment in itself and can be handled entirely from the complete orchestral score.

In addition to this, the new Pickford music is being arranged so that any orchestra ranging in size from two to forty pieces will be able to present the complete accompaniment. Each scene in the photoplay, even to the flash, is cued in the score sheets, thus making perfect synchronization an easy matter, even for the most ordinary musician. This also prevents trouble in the event of the loss of several feet of film from the picture through wear, etc.

Most of the score prepared by Mr. Stickles presents original themes interpolated from old Scottish songs. In accordance with the Benyon method, the role of Margot, portrayed by Mary Pickford, is given a particularly catchy theme which is played whenever she appears in the photoplay.

The score prepared by Mr. Stickles is published by G. Schirmer, Inc., New York City.

Some pretty influential exhibitors in various parts of the country seem to believe a lot they hear about profits in the publishing business, judging from the enthusiasm they are displaying in their new job of subscription agents. Possibly that old story about the manufacturer sticking to his own end, and the exhibitor to his is out of date. If there are any profits they will be well cared for, no doubt. THINK IT OVER.

Victrola as Accompaniment for Pictures.

THIS is how a Kentucky exhibitor solved the particular musical problem by which she was confronted:

Dear Sir.—We have, in a town of 1,200, a small theater seating 250. At first we tried a player piano. The music for the picture falls on me, so I am deeply interested in seeing that each picture has as good a musical setting as I can get. The piano proved very unsatisfactory, as it took so long to re-wind the rolls, and we could not make changes quick enough. So, after a long time, I hit upon what I consider the next best to having a real good pianist (which is something we can't afford). I bought a Victrola.

Now, if you have never heard of a Victrola being used in a picture show, do not condemn it. You see I can get any kind of music I want in this way—from the popular airs, waltzes, marches, on up to grand opera and the classics, played by the world's best musicians and, of course, I only use instrumental music.

I play just as much of the record as it is necessary, or play it over if needed. I can make my changes from one record to another in just a second or two, and as I go over my picture when the reels come in the morning and select what suits the different scenes, writing down my cues, I do get real satisfactory results.

Yours very sincerely,

(Mrs.) A. N. MILES, Eminence, Kentucky.

Managers in other small towns will probably find this plan an excellent one, as it is often impossible to get a good pianist and often too expensive where the seating capacity is small. Attention must be given to the selection of suitable records, and the following list from the catalog of the Victor Talking Machine Company is suggested for managers or musicians interested in the Victrola as means of musical interpretation for the films:

Amaryllis (Ghys), No. 67683. Andante from Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, No. 35275. Apple Blossoms (Reviere), No. 35101. Badinage (Herbert), No. 70053. Blue Danube Waltz (Strauss), No. 31294. Casse Noisette (Nut Cracker Suite) (Tschaiakowsky), No. 45053. Dance of the Hours from "Glaconda," No. 70070. Firefly Waltzes (Friml), No. 35278. Jewels of the Madonna Intermezzo, No. 35270. L'Arlesienne Prelude, Part I, No. 35461. L'Arlesienne Pastorale, Part I, No. 17660. Liebestraum (Liszt), No. 70046. Lohengrin, Prelude, No. 31779. March Militaire (Schubert), No. 35493. March Slave (Tschaiakowsky), No. 70050. Intermezzo and Nocturne from "Midsummer Night's Dream" (Mendelssohn), No. 35527. Natoma Dagger Dance (Herbert), No. 70049. Peer Gynt Suite (Grieg), No. 35470. "Romeo and Juliet" (Gounod). Juliet's Slumber, No. 17866. Scenes Pittoresques "Angelus" Massenet, No. 35437. Traviata Prelude (Verdi), No. 68027. Woodland Sketches, "An Old Trysting Place," "To a Wild Rose," (MacDowell), No. 60053.

Additional numbers suitable for depicting screen action can be secured by addressing Musical Editor, Moving Picture World, also questions regarding the Victrola for interpreting moving pictures will be answered by letter or through this department.

Three Important Harmony Books.

A STUDY OF MODERN HARMONY, by Rene Lenormand, is an exhaustive presentation of the latest phases into which the art of composition has developed in France. This book is replete with musical examples taken from the works of Louis Aubert, Bruneau, Chabrier, Chausson, Debussy, Dukas, Dupont, Faure, d'Indy, Ravel, Satie, Florent Schmitt and others. The author shows the many harmonic innovations of these men, which might seem at times to be discords rather than to merit the term of "harmony," can still be explained, and have their roots in established and recognized chord forms. They follow an underlying principle as closely as did the music of older masters. It must be acknowledged that Mr. Lenormand has solved the problem in the most interesting manner, and that his lucid exposition forms highly enlightening material. It was not the author's plan to write a treatise upon how to write modern music. Nevertheless, one cannot but feel that this subject, so succinctly treated, teaches an inspiring lesson to every musician actively engaged in composition, and that it will dissipate many erroneous beliefs with regard to supposedly arbitrary practices of modern French writers. Particularly instructive chapters are those dealing with chords of the seventh and ninth, with the preparation of discords, and with the novel devices for ending a piece. It is only natural that in this book the whole tone scale receives its due consideration, as it was mainly through the Neo-French School that its legitimate effects and usage have been introduced. Published by the Boston Music Co.

MODERN HARMONY—ITS EXPLANATION AND APPLICATION.—By A. Eaglefield Hull, Mus. Doc. Oxon., F. R. C. O. This work is intended, not to supplant, but to supplement the existing harmony books. Teachers, students and musicians will welcome this book, which is the first of its kind, dealing comprehensively with both the technical and aesthetic elucidation of modern music. It contains 400 examples from the works of Richard Strauss, Debussy, Stravinsky, Scriabine, Ravel, Schonberg, Albeniz, Dohnanyi, Korngold, Reger, Sibelius and of many other modern as well as earlier composers. In order to make the book interesting to the general reader, as well as useful to the student, a glossary of technical terms has been supplied for the convenience of the former, while the practical student may like to try his hand in the working out of some of the exercises appended to the volume. The book is attractively bound and contains 219 pages of actual text matter, besides handy indices. Published by the Boston Music Company.

MELODIES AND HOW TO HARMONIZE THEM.—By Edmonstone Duncan. The aim of this book is chiefly practical. An average student finds it difficult to begin harmonizing melodies, and he is usually left to pick it up by himself, with what aid he may derive from counterpoint and occasional remarks from his teacher. To such, the present treatise should appeal, while to the really gifted student (who finds melodies and basses offer no difference in degree of difficulty) benefit may accrue from a perusal of the examples, some of which are rare. Doubtless the most sensible method of employing the work will be to use it concurrently with a Manual on Harmony. As the best and most up-to-date in this line may be recommended the "Treatise on Harmony" by J. Humfrey Anger, with analytical keys for self-instruction. Published by the Boston Music Company.

NOCTURNE OP. 27, NO. 2—Chopin.

This Nocturne in C-sharp minor belongs among the most poetical of Chopin's works. On account of its romantic character it rather eludes analysis. A poetical picture, suggested by this Nocturne, stirs our imagination, giving more color to our interpretations. Suppose we imagine in this Nocturne, a calm, silvery lake, on a misty night, moonlight shining softly through the clouds. A sweet melody is sung to the accompaniment of the gentle motion of the waves. Farther on there comes a gathering storm; the lovely melody is interrupted by cries of anguish, which soon reaches the climax of despair, amidst the restless tossing of the stormy waves. Suddenly there bursts a new note, and there we come back again to the calm and mist and moonlight.

THE FLATTERER—Chaminade.

Cecile Chaminade has become known all over the world for the daintiness and piquancy of her music. Her compositions, fresh and individual in style, are tuneful and attractive. Her harmonic changes are captivating in originality, and her work marked with grace that is extremely individual and at the same time distinctively French. "Lisonjera" is a Spanish word meaning flatterer, or cajoler. The piece should be played with humorous allurement and should be made very rhythmic, with full attention to rubato and all changes or tempo; and the pace should not be too languid.

A DREAM OF LOVE—Liszt.

This piece is the best known of a series of three Nocturnes written by Liszt, depicting the emotions suggested by certain love-poems by Uhland and Freiligrath. This Nocturne consists entirely of the development of a luscious melody of a rather sentimental character which is brought to a climax of effect culminating in one of those typical bravura passages that are so distinctly characteristic of Liszt's style.

There is only one real way to censor pictures. Punish the man who makes them, just as the publisher of a forbidden book is punished. No new laws are necessary for this, merely persistent enforcement of existing legislation. Were it possible to ship film through the mails, it is probable that Atlanta would already be housing some examples, but the law against obscene matter does not apply solely to matter in the mails.

The Development of the Film Player.

The limits of the film player should command the attention of every exhibitor who contemplates the purchase of such an instrument for depicting the action on the screen.

The automatic player-piano, combined with the organ is the surprise of the musical world and late improvements and inventions have made this instrument the most satisfactory single instrument for the musical accompaniment of moving pictures. The automatic film player has developed from a very small and imperfect player-piano, driven by an electric motor, into a huge affair in which the organ feature predominates. It is well that the exhibitor understands the limits of the film player and he should also have a comprehensive knowledge of its possibilities. Many exhibitors, hearing the film player for the first time, are immediately impressed with it, but intelligent understanding should enter into the purchase of such an instrument and architectural and acoustical limits should be thoroughly considered.

What may be called architectural limits is of first importance. The average theater, by the conditions of its size, shape and manner of building, limits the development of the film player. Few theaters are constructed with a view to having the music well located so as to get the best results. The orchestra pit, the location of the organ, the piano or the film player usually receive the last consideration from the architect. As a rule the builders have an idea that the music should be somewhere in front of the stage and they usually leave this important phase until last—until it is too late to arrange the proper architectural and acoustical scheme for the location of the film player.

Little by little prospective builders of film theaters are coming to figure ahead on their musical requirements. That means to say that the purchase of an organ is often considered and even completed before the theater itself is finished. At present the ordinary moving picture theater is designed with rectangular floor plan and semi-cylindrical roof. The type is almost ideal for all purposes of sound, save for its sharp corners, which have a tendency to promote echoes. These corners could, of course, be rounded off, but it is too much to expect most architects or even managers to consider little things like these.

The arrangement of pipes is also highly important. The roof of the theater is usually low, and the organ pipes often have to be put on a gallery on account of there being no space for them on the floor. Hence sixteen-foot pipes are sometimes too long or else come too near the roof. It is necessary in planning the typical organ for film purposes, especially in smaller houses, to see that the Bourdon and other sixteen-foot stops, if there be any more, are placed down as low as possible, for if they are placed too near the roof, they will tend to sound heavy, rumbly and echoish.

An organ must have a good foundation, and any instrument of this sort which is to fill a hall seating 500 people must be provided with at least one strong bass, sixteen-foot stop, and two good eight-foot Diapasons on the manuals. Let these be provided first, and the remaining stops are not then half as important. Excellent results can be obtained if the organ contains an eight-foot stop of clarinet tone, a four-foot oboe tone, a four-foot flute, an eight-foot Gamba and a four-foot Salicional. With these one can do anything an organ needs to do for the interpretation of screen action.

If there is plenty of room, let there be added to this a stopped diapason of eight-foot tone, another Gamba, and an eight-foot trombone or trumpet. The sixteen-foot Bourdon will be on the pedal, while on the first manual will be the eight-foot metal diapason, the stopped diapason, one Gamba (low) and one flute. On the other organ will be the open diapason, the other Gamba (high), the oboe, the clarinet and the trumpet or trombone. Enclose these in swell boxes and you have an expressive organ of small size that can be played by hand most satisfactorily, and that by a double roll system can be played also as a solo automatic organ of considerable capacity and of good tonal quality. It will sound well, with strong middle voices, clean bass and not too squeaky a treble. Suppose such an organ divided, and placed with one organ on each side of the screen, while the sixteen-foot pedal stop is cut in two also and placed half on each side. There you have an arrangement quite feasible wherever a motion picture theater has any spare room in front. In many cases, where space is hard to find, a gallery arrangement can be used for the manual stops, leaving the pedal stop on the ground floor level.

Of course, we are counseling an ideal; but it will soon be seen, upon analysis, that it is much better in every way to have pure organ tone with good foundation and no fancy stops than to put in the fancy stops at the expense of the foundation. If you have a good diapason tone and plenty of it, then the next great requirement is that the manual stops shall be enclosed in swell boxes. With a two-manual organ this means that you have in reality two organs each in its swell box, placed on either side of the screen. It is just as easy to have two swells as to have but one, and the result—that the organ becomes expressive in every stop; a result to be desired by every exhibitor who wishes the best musical results. Add expressiveness to solid tone and you have as much as you really need in an organ of relatively small size.

Even the above catalog of stops could be cut down by removing the stopped diapason and the trumpet or trombone stops. But the idea of two manual organs should be rigidly adhered to, at any cost, for the single manual instrument is not, strictly speaking, an organ at all when played by hand.

The same remarks apply to the pneumatic player attached to the film organ. As a matter of fact, a double-roll system, with one roll for each manual and couplers allowing the pedal to be hooked up with either organ as required is quite adequate. A double tracker system with two rows of perforations, and roll to correspond, is even better for convenience sake but more complex to read, not to mention the patent rights that cannot be disturbed for some time to come.

There are many little problems to be solved, as will be seen from the above brief considerations; yet they are quite simple when taken up in an intelligent manner, with real knowledge of the requirements.

To play an organ for moving pictures is an art in itself, and there are very few organists who are now practicing the art of playing for moving pictures who have any conception of how their playing sounds out in the body of the theater. The idea too often is that an "effect" can only be made by pulling out all the stops. And another mistake many organists make is the use of the tremulant. Organists playing organs equipped with a vox humana should use this effect sparingly and not play every number with the tremulant or vox humana. The acoustic properties of the average moving picture theater will not stand the excessive use of certain stops and they should be used with discretion. A simple plain diapason tone is the necessary basis for successful organ playing in a theater of the architectural type common to the majority of moving picture theaters; and exhibitors should not fail to realize this when they consider the purchase of an instrument.

It is highly important to remember that good solid tone, based on the open diapason of the organ proper, with a few stops of soft reed quality to provide variety, is the best possible equipment for any sort of organ in any sort of room, and especially the sort of room the average motion picture theater is. The resources of the moving picture theater in space available and in respect to the money to be laid out, are not usually large enough to permit the erection of a great concert organ. The film-player for general use must have first of all a good organ foundation and the diapason should receive first consideration. If to this are added stopped diapason, octave, twelfth, one "mixture" of three ranks, flute, trumpet and salicional and gamba, no more will be needed. Any more will do more harm than good and will be simply wasted.

It is hoped that in time there will be enough musicians available for playing the organ, but to put such an instrument into the hands of a young lady who has just graduated from piano playing is mere foolishness. The subject "Film-Players," "Organs," "Photo-Players," etc., will be thoroughly dealt with in a series of articles now in course of preparation.

Membership Requirements of the American Guild of Organists.

Theater organists will be interested in the requirements for examination of the American Guild of Organists of the United States and Canada. Full particulars may be obtained from W. R. Hedden, Mus. Bac., F. A. G. O., Chairman of Examination Committee, 170 West 75th Street, New York City.

The requirements for the Guild examination are as follows:

FOR THE CERTIFICATE OF ASSOCIATE.

Tests at the Organ.

1. Candidates must be prepared to play the whole or any portion of one of the following compositions, the selection of the piece to be made by the candidate: "Fugue in E Flat" ("St. Anne's"), Bach, Bridge and Higgs edition, Book 6, page 36, or No. 1, Book III, Peter's edition, or "Postlude in D," Henry Smart (H. W. Gray Co.).

The Success of S. L. Rothapfel.

At a time not so far distant the music supplied at the average motion picture house was of a grade about two degrees above that of a blind man's hand organ. The film business wasn't the sixth largest industry in the country then, and the picture houses were still in the dime museum and side show category. Naturally they were operated by managers of the side show stripe, who judged music by its value as a ballyhoo and accordingly placed their old style raucous electric pianos close to the doorway where they would compel the attention of the people on the street. Never mind the people in the audience; their money was in the box office. If the music was not to their taste they could move on and leave vacant seats for others who had a nickel to squander.

That was the first phase. Then, following the player piano came the piano player. His interpretation was about as good as that of his automatic predecessor, except that the mechanical piano played all the notes and he didn't.

But "the movies" were progressing. The places where they were shown were getting cleaner. A better class of people was beginning to patronize them. Prices went up to a dime and managers were overcome by a sudden rush of money to the box office. They could afford more music, so the rough work was taken off the piano player's hands and turned over to a trap drummer. This virtuoso on the cow bell and the auto horn added much indiscriminate atmosphere to the pictures, and his installation was a step in the right direction. A violinist or some one who had been told he was a violinist, was usually added to the ensemble at this period, but the less said about him the better.

Next came the pipe organ, and with that the motion picture began to come into its own from the standpoint of musical accompaniment. Things were possible with an organ which no handful of journeymen musicians could even approach, and the organ business picked up all over the country.

Also certain inventive geniuses began turning out elaborate mechanical orchestras which one man could operate and which could produce practically all the effects originated by the nimble-fingered trap drummer.

Even at this stage, however, there was no intelligence brought to bear in correlating the spirit of the music with the spirit of the pictures. The orchestra and the organ played tunes, that was all.

Then in the grimy little mining town of Forest City, Pa., something happened. A young man there was running a nickel picture show in a dance hall back of a saloon. Scarcely the environment to produce an aesthetic ideal one would say; yet in those sordid surroundings a desire was born which has been bountifully gratified in recent years and has left its impress wherever motion pictures are shown.

For this young man who ran the picture show and separated the Poles and Huns whenever knives began to flash in the combats incident to pay-day, had an imagination which made thrilling flights into the future. He was gifted with the soul of a musician and an artist, and as he worked he thought, and dreamed and hoped.

That was seven years ago. Today that young man selects the musical numbers for an orchestra which acknowledges no superior save the Metropolitan Opera House. The pictures which that orchestra interprets are presented in a theater which serves as the model for every new motion picture house throughout the country. It has the largest organ in any theater anywhere; its auditorium is lighted by a color system unique in the beauty and variety of its possible effects; it stands on the choicest theatrical location in New York; and it is filled rightly with a clientele which represents quite the opposite extreme from the Polish miners of Forest City. The theater is the Rialto. The young man who directs it is Samuel Rothapfel.

Every new spectacular film production, the kind that constitutes an evening's entertainment, has its specially arranged score. Some of these, notably that for Geraldine Farrar's appearance in "Carmen," was arranged by Mr. Rothapfel. Others has enlisted the services of many well-known composers and directors. The desire for interpretative music has become fixed with the public and their standards of taste in such matters have been immeasurably elevated.

The latest and most gratifying result obtained by presenting classical music in motion picture houses is the increased interest it has created in the opera and the higher class concerts. Thousands of people go to see motion pictures every week, and to get the best pictures they have listened to good music. Symphony concerts and grand opera have limited seasons and comparatively few performances. Also the prices are high. The motion picture houses are open the year round; they give several performances a day, and the price is within the reach of everyone. For this reason Mr. Rothapfel makes the well-substantiated claim that the orchestras in the theaters with which he has been connected have done more to create a popular demand for high-class music than all the symphony orchestras put together.

Large Organ for Detroit Theater.

Hillgreen, Lane & Co., of Alliance, Ohio, have under construction one of the largest theater organs in the United States. It is to be installed at the Madison theater, Detroit, Mich.

The specifications of this instrument were drafted by Arthur H. J. Searle, of Detroit, in co-operation with the builders, and Mr. Searle is to preside at the organ when it is completed.

The following scheme contains virtually 10 duplexed stops and presents a large variety and wealth of power:

GREAT ORGAN.

Double Open Diapason, 16 ft.	Grosse Floete, 8 ft.
Major Diapason, 8 ft.	Octave, 4 ft.
Minor Diapason, 8 ft.	Harmonic Flute, 4 ft.
Gamba, 8 ft.	Tuba Mirabilis, 8 ft.
Gamba Celeste, 8 ft.	Tuba Clarion, 4 ft.
Duiciana, 8 ft.	Tuba Profunda, 16 ft.
Doppel Floete, 8 ft.	Xylophone.

SWELL ORGAN.

Contra Gamba, 16 ft.	Rohr Floete, 4 ft.
Open Diapason, 8 ft.	Contra Fagotta, 16 ft.
Viol d'Orchestre, 8 ft.	Oboe, 8 ft.
Viol Celeste, 8 ft.	French Horn, 8 ft.
Salicional, 8 ft.	Vox Humana, 8 ft.
Hohl Floete, 8 ft.

ORCHESTRAL ORGAN.

Geigen Principal, 8 ft.	Flute d'Amour, 4 ft.
Viola, 8 ft.	Piccolo, 2 ft.
Unda Maris, 8 ft.	Clarinet, 8 ft.
Concert Flute, 8 ft.	Orchestral Oboe, 8 ft.
Dolce, 8 ft.	Harp.
Quintadena, 8 ft.

ANTIPHONAL ORGAN.

Diapason, 8 ft.	Wald Floete, 4 ft.
Arzähler, 8 ft.	Cor Anglais, 8 ft.
Vox Angelica, 8 ft.	Vox Humana, 8 ft.
Gedeckt, 8 ft.	Cathedral Chimes.

PEDAL ORGAN.

(Augmented)

Resultant, 32 ft.	Cello, 8 ft.
Double Open Diapason, 16 ft.	Contra Fagotta, 16 ft.
Vioione, 16 ft.	Tuba Profunda, 16 ft.
Bourdon, 16 ft.	Tromba, 8 ft.
Grosse Floete, 8 ft.

An Album of National Music for Musicians Playing Weeklies.

The musician playing weeklies is often confronted with the task of supplying National music to many scenes. For example: one scene in a weekly may be laid in Turkey, the next scene in Holland and the scene following in Greece, etc.

While many musicians have memorized a number of National airs, particularly America, Great Britain, Germany and France, the national music of other countries is not always easily memorized.

Carl Fischer publishes an album of National Anthems, Hymns and Patriotic songs containing the following National airs:

- AMERICA—"Hail Columbia," "The Star Spangled Banner," "Yankee Doodle," Columbia, the Gem of the Ocean," "My Country 'tis of Thee," "Maryland, my Mariand," "Dixie's Land," "Hail to the Chief."
- AUSTRIA—"Got erhalte Franz den Kaiser."
- BAVARIA—"Heil unserm Konig, Heil."
- BELGIUM—"La Brabanconne."
- BOHEMIA—National Hymn.

DENMARK—"King Christian."
 FRANCE—"La Marseillaise," "Partant pour la Syrie."

This album is small in size and should be on every musician's stand who endeavors to play weeklies correctly. Arranged for piano, the album can be used for organ, and it is also arranged for full and small orchestra.

Music Every Musician Should Know.

Kammenoi-Ostrow—Rubenstein.

This piece forms one of a series of portraits from the Album de Portraits, Opus 10. The title—meaning "Stone Island"—requires explanation. It refers to an island in the River Neva near Petrograd upon which is an old monastery famous in Russian history. The piece can be considered to belong to the class of descriptive music; being doubtless an attempt to portray the thoughts and emotions aroused by contemplation of the great names of the past, their strivings and achievements, in contrast to the present peaceful environment. Rippling water is suggested, and the bells and chants of the monastery are portrayed.

Hungarian Dances—Brahms.

Funeral March of a Marionette—Gounod.

Gounod's piece is one of the best examples of humor, as the drollery comes from the clever humor put into the music itself. Even without titles and sub-titles, this march would be noticeably comic. In playing this number, the musician should make a strong contrast between legato and staccato. Let the music have a steady rhythm, and a little touch of Bohemian jollity. The end must die away very softly.

Doubled.

Something new is the double use of a Chaplin film by the Heiberger, of the Bethlehems. They played The Rink in one of their houses at the matinee and at another in the evening. Bicycling a program is by no means uncommon, but this subject was shown but once in each house, at the Lorenz in the afternoon and at the Broad in the evening.

Music Helps Acting in William Fox Studios.

"Music hath charms," saith the poets. "It certainly hath," every director at the William Fox studios will agree. For, whether you know it or not, it is true that an orchestra plays at each of the Fox plants while practically all of the scenes are being filmed.

The music is there because tests proved the efficiency of cadence. It was found that the players worked much more easily and that the tedium and constant strain were relieved greatly by the presence of a small group of musicians.

The music played is of the utmost "democracy," chiefly because of the methods used in screening a picture.

Scenes laid in one room are taken consecutively by the director, regardless of the order in which they appear in the finished product. This, of course, makes it necessary to skip back and forth in the scenario.

Consequently, in filming a script, dramatic values change more rapidly than the weather. These shifts, in turn, are reflected in the music, which is always appropriate to the situation which is being enacted.

A sample program of an orchestra's afternoon at the studio would read like a musical melange. It would be not the least unusual, for instance, to have in succession bits from "La Boheme," "Ragging the Scale," "The Maiden's Prayer," "Aloha Oe" and "I Vespri Siciliani."

A Film Best Seller.

Thanhouser Film Corporation announces the release of "A Modern Monte Cristo" through Pathe exchanges on February 4. Vincent Serrano is the star. "A Modern Monte Cristo" is to be a "best seller" according to the forecast of Edwin Thanhouser. The story was written by Lloyd Lonergan, the direction was by W. Eugene Moore.

As a story with rapidly tumbling incidents, "A Modern Monte Cristo" is a fast-told drama. Lively situations of wide diversity include a shipwreck; the marooning on an island of the man seeking vengeance and the little daughter of his enemy; an aeroplane rescue, and pearl-fishing in diving outfits. Supporting Mr. Serrano in the cast are Thomas A. Curran, Helen Badgley, Gladys Dore and Boyd Marshall.

"Civilization" Bookings in the Mid West.

The Mid West Civilization Corporation, which handles the Thomas H. Ince spectacle "Civilization" for the states of Colorado, Utah, Wyoming, New Mexico, etc., report many bookings for the picture in their territory. The picture is to be shown shortly at Pueblo, Colorado Springs, by the Moore Graves Amusement Company; then at the Atlas theater, Cheyenne, and in other large theaters of the territory. It is stipulated by the holders of the territorial rights that the admission charges in these and other theaters is to be not less than 25 cents to 75 cents per person. The offices of the Mid West Civilization Corporation are at 763-764 Gas and Electric Building, Denver, Colorado.

Mutual Weekly a Feature.

Los Angeles, Cal., the home of so many producing companies, has long been regarded as the city in which competition is the keenest between producers to get their film on the screen. It is therefore a matter of gratification to the Gaumont Company and the Mutual Film Corporation to announce that The Mutual Weekly has a seven days' run at Clune's Broadway Theater, the finest motion picture house in Los Angeles. It is used from Sunday to Saturday, inclusive, to be succeeded by the next issue.

Ivan Popular in New England.

F. J. Willis, the manager of the Ivan Film Exchange, located at 23 Piedmont street, Boston, Mass., the distributor of Ivan photoplays in the New England states, has in a remarkably short time completed arrangements for the first runs of Ivan photoplays in the leading theaters of the largest cities. Every Ivan photoplay secures a first run of not less than one week in Boston at the Modern theater, and the largest theaters of Providence, New Haven, Portland, Manchester, Springfield, Worcester and so on.

Music for the Picture

Conducted by CLARENCE E SINN and NORMAN STUCKEY.

THE design of this department is to diffuse among musicians and exhibitors correct information on all important subjects pertaining to music for the film, to improve the quality of playing and to raise the standard of music in motion picture theaters.

Any questions concerning music; suitable instrumentation; questions relating to the organ and mechanical players; in fact, any queries, criticisms or suggestions dealing with the musical interpretation for moving pictures will be answered thorough this department.

By Clarence E. Sinn.

ARTICLE II.

THE grace note the turn and like embellishments may, with very slight modification, be changed to "passing notes," and the phrase resulting may suggest other variations. Note the groups of triple grace notes in Ex. 4.

Using this as a starting point the most likely thing to suggest itself would be the variant as shown in the top line of Ex. 5. (A.) Nothing very characteristic about it, neither is it particularly attractive, but by changing the tempo to $\frac{3}{4}$ we get a phrase which is a little better. (B.) This could be used in lively passages similar to Ex. 2, which was given in the previous letter. (Article I.)

The examples given above are not to be considered as finished products

Ex. 5.

nor themes worked out to completion. They are given merely as illustrations of a mechanical means of making one theme suggest another. The new theme resulting may resemble the original closely or remotely, just as you wish. As a general rule, when using a theme to represent your pictured character, you want that theme to be recognized by your hearers whenever you play it. And if you ever do feel that variety demands a change—or at least a modification—and you do not care to let your descriptive theme be lost sight of (I should have said sound instead of sight, only I don't know how to ring in the word), you can satisfy yourself and the hearers by modifying and elaborating the theme.

Ex. 6.

If your invention is good, you need no hints as to how to use it. If you haven't had much experience along this line, you will find in these articles much help as to the modifying and elaborating melodies in a mechanical way.

The last article touched upon changing the tempo and reversing the keys from major to minor, etc. This bears upon the introduction of "passing notes."

Look again at the small notes in Ex. 4. You can see what relationship they bear to the original melody, and yet how they can suggest (when changed to passing notes) an entirely different theme.

By changing the two themes suggested in Ex. 4. (A. and B.) to minor keys (make the signature four flats) we carry the idea still further.

Ex. 6 gives still another form of the original theme. This time we have simply lengthened the first notes of the group—making it a $\frac{3}{4}$ Andante mod. The character is much the same as that of the theme in its original form. (Ex. 1. Article I.)

A "running" accompaniment is also shown in an extra staff. (C.)

Tubular Organs.

By Clarence E. Sinn.

SOME time ago in describing an instrument in this department I quoted an organist as saying "a tubular organ is not a pipe organ."

I was trying to get some information at the time regarding organ mechanics—something outside of the technical expressions of the factory. I am in receipt of two communications from Mr. F. F. Pitts, president of the "Pitts Pipe Organ Co," Omaha, Neb. Mr. Pitts has partly promised to write an article for this department concerning pipe-organs and I am sure he could give us something of interest. Indeed, I should like to use the two letters I now have from him, but he asks me to defer quoting him at present. I'll confess here and now that I am using this means to try and pry a letter out of him. However, I cannot refrain from using a couple of passages from his letters—and I hope he will forgive me for it. He says in one place:

"In your article you convey the impression that a tubular organ is not a pipe-organ. Such ignorance stamps the writer as incompetent to deal with the subject intelligently and comprehensively."

In another place he says:

"Please let me make this plain, that a Tubular Organ has no reference to the pipes whatsoever, but is only applicable to the mechanism. It denotes the method employed in the operation of the mechanical parts of the instrument."

Here follows a short but interesting description of organ mechanism which I will not print at present—not until I see whether Brother Pitts is going to come across with an article.

As to the term "tubular organ," I have heard it used on a few occasions to differentiate instruments containing pipes of a certain kind from other instruments containing only another kind of organ pipes. Now the organist quoted in the previous article certainly used the expression in this sense—a wrong sense it seems. I am not an organ huffer and in seeking details about these instruments I gather information where I can, and take every precaution I can think of to verify it before sending it to the printer. Now the combination instruments which have entered the field are a comparatively new thing. By reason of their makers' direct appeal to moving picture exhibitors, these machines have a news value to me. I believe their inventors and builders are trying honestly and conscientiously to fill what they believe to be a want. And judging from the growth of their business one would be justified in presuming the exhibitors were of the same opinion. Now anything about these instruments will interest a certain number of Moving Picture World readers, and so when a manufacturer sends me word that he has something new I go and take a look at it. If it looks good I will say so. I can only vouch (personal knowledge) from what I see and hear and understand. As much of the description is usually technical, I sometimes try to simplify it and submit it to the demonstrator before using it in a letter. Sometimes I get some good tips from instrumentalists working in the theaters. But one must allow for two things, namely: The attitude of the maker or of the demonstrator who are so wrapped up in their project as to be over-enthusiastic quite often. Second: The attitude of the average organist, who is often bitterly prejudiced against innovations.

And this brings me back to my starting point. When I quoted the party as saying "a tubular organ is not a pipe-organ," he did not refer to the action but to the kind of pipes used. That was the impression I tried to convey and I know some of my readers understood it in that way, for at least one of them thinks I favored one "tone-quality" of organ pipes above the tone quality of another. On re-reading my article (Dec. 16) I can see how it might be made to read that way, but I shouldn't have let it. The tone-quality of one kind of pipes is different from that of another. Both wood and metal pipes (including "reed pipes") are used in the large and pretentious church organs. It would be absurd to say the tone quality of one was better than that of another. But they are vastly different. The instrument I saw at the "Harmo-lectric" factory was as I described it. Some of my information was the result of my own observations, some of it (necessarily) given by the superintendent and demonstrator; and all verified insofar as I was able to do so.

As to relative merits of any of the combination instruments, I would not presume to discuss the matter even if I had an opinion. It is largely a matter of personal opinion, and not a proper subject of this department.

I understand the "Harmo" people will fit their instruments with any or all kinds of organ pipes, to suit the buyers' pleasure or fancy.

I believe Seeburg and some others are prepared to do the same thing. I expect to visit his factory (Seeburg's) soon and see what they have. They told me last summer they would have something new to talk about pretty soon, but I haven't heard from them since.

Musical Score of Joan the Woman.

Reviewed by Norman Stuckey.

FOR the Lasky production, "Joan, the Woman," featuring Geraldine Farrar, now playing at the Forty-fourth Street Theater, William Furst has composed a musical setting that now stands as the most noteworthy film score ever heard in New York theaters.

Mr. Furst was formerly musical director for David Belasco and the late Charles Frohman. His musical setting of "Kismet" and other productions attracted wide attention.

This is not the first time that Mr. Furst has composed a music score for a big "Joan of Arc" production as it was he who composed the music for the Joan of Arc pageant in the Harvard Stadium in 1907, when Charles Frohman there presented Maude Adams as the immortal Maid or Orleans.

When Miss Farrar was at the Lasky studios in Hollywood, California, last summer, appearing as Joan of Arc before the camera, Mr. Furst at the same time was working on the music score for the production. This association between the composer, star and producer, Cecil B. De Mille, established a new kind of relationship so far as the musical setting of pictures is concerned.

An incident of interest in this connection is that when Mr. De Mille came to New York and first showed "Joan, the Woman," privately to friends, he remarked when they congratulated him—"I am glad you are delighted, but wait until you see it at the same time you hear Mr. Furst's score." It was a word of prophecy more than realized at the public exhibition.

The history of "Joan" is known by nearly everybody and the screen version, written by Jeanie MacPherson follows history in its essentials. "Joan, the Woman" traces the story of the peasant girl in the little village of Domremy to her final martyrdom by burning. We see the brooding of Joan, the coming of the spiritual call to deliver her country, her appearance at the shabby make-shift court of the weakling, Charles VII., her electrical appeal to her courtiers and the march of the newly created army, led by the girl in white armor, upon the British forces laying siege to the city of Orleans. The story moves swiftly from the crowning of Charles VII., at Rheims to the ultimate capture of Joan, her cruel persecution by the Bishop Pierre Cauchon and her death as a heretic, neglected by the king who owed his throne to the girl.

The story itself offers wonderful opportunities for a composer, and Mr. Furst has taken cognizance of these and the result is an exceptionally beautiful score, resonant in tone, finely balanced, and by turns delicate and powerful.

From a musical standpoint, the score itself is distinctive. It is exceedingly well orchestrated and this means much, especially where a great variety of tone painting is necessary to faithfully portray the many highly dramatic scenes.

The orchestra comprises forty capable musicians, an important point overlooked in many productions of such magnitude and quite necessary where much solo work is required, and there is plenty in Mr. Furst's score.

There is an orchestral prelude lasting about four minutes, with brass introduction, followed by a short Oboe solo. The prelude ends and the curtain is raised during the sounding of deep-toned chimes which are on the stage. There is no music during the showing of the descriptive titles.

Two themes are quite prominent throughout the entire score—the love theme—a beautiful andante movement, played during the love scenes between Joan and Eric Trent, and a misterioso whenever L'Oiseleur, a fanatical monk, appears.

The love theme is made highly effective as a cello solo, accompanied by harp and later with strings and harp.

Muted brass is used with excellent effect in many of the big scenes, but Mr. Furst does not hesitate to use the entire brass section in scenes of any magnitude. Particularly noticeable in the brass section is a Tuba, which is used effectively.

As the story concerns Englishmen fighting in France, Mr. Furst has cleverly arranged the Marseillaise, which he introduces in many scenes. He also uses the English song, Rule Britannia. Combining Rule Britannia with the Marseillaise in different parts of the picture, a novel and appropriate effect is secured.

When the Burgundians, led by Eric Trent, attacked the little French village of Domremy, there is a splendid and colorful agitato. This is followed by another agitato of entirely different tempo, when the soldiers put the peasants to rout and ransack the village.

When Eric discovers Joan, the love theme is heard for the first time, interrupted by a highly dramatic movement when Gaspard wounds Eric. The love theme is heard again when Joan sympathizes with Eric and continues quite softly until they part.

Later Joan seeks an interview with Charles VII. The guards laugh at Joan, and when Joan snatches a dagger from a nearby soldier's sheath and breaks the sword of the soldier who doubts her faith, there is a sudden crash and a brief pause in the music.

The scene changes to the court, where music of lively character is introduced. Charles VII is finally persuaded to see Joan. A beautiful andante is played, and during Joan's interview with Charles VII, the music blends perfectly with the varied action, reaching a grandioso climax when Joan assures Charles VII and his subjects that she will save France.

The scene suddenly changes. The English soldiers approach the city walls. Rule Britannia, arranged as a brilliant march, is used effectively.

Arrayed for battle, Joan enters the hall, announced by the fanfare of trumpets. Mr. Furst introduces a short hymn here as Charles VII blesses Joan, who is about to lead the soldiers of France into battle. A long drum roll calls the soldiers to the colors.

During a stirring march, the troops, led by Joan, depart for the city of Orleans. The music increases in tempo as Joan enters the city, and during the battle scenes, dramatic agitatos are used. This battle music is very descriptive, with its orchestral masses of tone and its wonderful harmonic colors.

Later, Joan is wounded, and when discovered by Eric Trent, the love theme is heard again, and it reaches a beautiful climax when Eric surrenders to the victorious Joan.

In the opening of Part II, Joan returns victorious. For this scene Mr. Furst has composed a splendid triumphal march. When Eric is brought before Joan and sentenced to imprisonment, the love theme is again made quite prominent.

Mr. Furst has composed a colorful coronation march for the scene when Charles VII is crowned. A short religioso movement is heard as the priest crowns Charles VII, and strains of the Marseillaise are again introduced.

Later, a peasant calls and begs Joan to return to her parents. Joan refuses and a pathetic andante makes this scene one of sadness.

In the chapel, Eric is brought before Joan and given his freedom. Eric confesses his love for Joan. The love theme is heard again when Joan tells Eric that her love is for France alone, and for him to go his way and forget her.

During the scene when L'Oiseleur, the fanatical monk, tells Charles VII that Joan is a witch, Mr. Furst introduces a minor theme, which is heard throughout the score whenever the monk appears.

Later, Eric returns to the English camp. He is ordered to capture Joan, which he does, much against his wishes, and when Joan learns that Eric is responsible for her capture, a beautiful and dramatic andante movement is introduced which is totally untrammelled in matter of expression.

When Joan is being ransomed, the music reaches a superb dramatic climax. Joan is led to trial for witchcraft, and a slow, minor march creates a scene of sadness and despair.

Eric tries to rescue Joan, and Mr. Furst, never at loss for a fitting dramatic movement, introduces another effective agitato in this scene.

There is lively music during the King's festival, followed by characteristic numbers while the girls are dancing.

The scene changes. Joan, in prison, has not lost faith, and Mr. Furst has composed some beautiful, religious music, powerful in harmonic treatment and rich in tonal beauty.

Music of sad and minor character is introduced when Joan is led to the stake, and when Eric approaches and hands Joan a small wooden cross, the love theme, with heart-breaking pathos, is heard again.

Mr. Furst has secured a wonderful orchestral effect during the fire scene, and aside from being entirely original in treatment, it is exceptionally descriptive and fine.

The picture ends with the Marseillaise, full brass. There is a brief pause and then three sustained chords.

The score of "Joan, the Woman" is a profoundly beautiful one, noble in conception, and wrought out in an infinity of subtle detail of nuance, dynamic contrast and orchestral color.

Mr. Furst can well be proud of his score, and all interested in the musical interpretation of moving pictures should not fail to see "Joan, the Woman," and hear Mr. William Furst's symphonic masterpiece.

New Popular Numbers.

One-Steps—"How's Every Thing in Dixie?" The Expression of Human Emotion in the Works of Richard Wagner.

LOOKING through Wagner's musico-dramatic works we must acknowledge, whatever musical creed we have, that there are parts which are of a beauty unsurpassed in the past and present literature of music; parts that will take hold of us with irresistible force, sweep through our system like a tornado and often leave us exhausted and prostrated. Any person who has been fortunate to hear "Götterdämmerung" cannot forget the dramatic power of this enormous tragedy, the intense passionate and fiercely emotional music that can never be forgotten.

The same feelings will be experienced in "Tristan and Isolde," and in still stronger measure. Whether this stirring up of one's innermost being is the final object of general art may perhaps be questioned, but it is surely one of the principal factors in dramatic art. It must take hold of us, force us to follow the action on the stage and to actually feel and live over again with the composer what has moved his heart. Only that which has lived and stormed, suffered and complained in the composer's heart, will ignite the audience, and stir it up.

Dramatic music appeals more directly than any other to our heart and emotions. The composer with the most human feeling, with the most passion, will follow his instinct a great deal more than his scheming reason and will always be sure of moving his audience, especially those that come to him not biase, but with unspoiled heart and undegenerated ideas and nerves.

Wagner once said, with certain pride, that his audience was up in the gallery and that he always was sure to touch the heart of the common people, whether or not they knew anything about his revolutionary ideas in music, his orchestration, harmonies or leit-motifs.

Such part of Wagner's works, where the dramatic flood rises high, where he has left philosophy and deliberately planned theatrical effects at home and has followed his strong emotional and dramatic nature, where he reveals to us the depths of his own burning passion, these are the parts that are most beautiful in his dramas. The orchestration is here the most ingenious, spontaneous and striking; the melodies the most characteristic and beautiful, the harmonies the most suggestive and touching.

Take, for instance, Siegfried's horn-call in the end of the greatest of all paeons in the "Götterdämmerung." Since Siegfried's youthful days this happy phrase has gaily fluttered from the horn with its merry 9-8 time and its bright major key. Now it appears in 4-4 time and in minor, laden down with heavy harmony, the cheerful rhythm is torn to pieces; tired and exhausted, it staggers to its end and the syncopated notes make it appear like a face drawn up in agony and wretched pain.

Wagner's musical expressions of human emotions are wonderfully true and characteristic as they are beautiful, touching and pathetic. These passages appeal to everybody capable of being moved by art; they are aglow with intense fire, fraught with anguish, and with their mournful pathos they bring tears to the strongest man.

Take, for instance, Tannhauser's "Pilgrimage to Rome," musically narrating the suffering of the minstrel; the first act of the "Valkyrie," with its quick changes of emotional pictures; take other places in "Lohengrin," "Tristan," "Nihelungen" and "Parsifal." Wherever we look we find the emotional life reflected in the masterly handled orchestra. Here it is the far distant horn of Dunding which speaks of the trembling fear of Sieglinde; again it is the beautiful phrase in the tender woodwind recalling in Parsifal the dim picture of his mother, lost in early youth. Then again it is the sorrowful little melodic phrase which foretells to us the sad fate of Tristan and Isolde.

In such moments Wagner never fails; he always accomplishes his purpose to impress upon his hearers just what is felt in his own heart, whether his means be a broad, sweeping melody, a small tympani solo, a sequence of brilliant iridescent chords or an intense phrase, which, like the outburst of uncontrollable passion, rends through the orchestra with its unruly syncopated rhythm.

Bonnet, Distinguished French Organist, Arrives.

Joseph Bonnet, the distinguished French organist, arrived in New York January 14 from Paris via Bordeaux, on the steamer Chicago. Mr. Bonnet, one of the most prominent pupils of the late Alexandre Guilmant, has been for years organist of Saint Eustache, Paris, and the successor of the late Alexandre Guilmant as official organist for the Society of Concerts of the National Conservatory. Among recent honors conferred upon him was his unanimous election as Honorary Fellow of the Royal College of Organists of London, this election taking place at the time of the fiftieth anniversary of that institution.

A reception was tendered Mr. Bonnet by Dr. William C. Carl at the Waldorf-Astoria on January 29th which was attended by many persons prominent in the musical and social circles of New York.

Mr. Bonnet, who is here on leave of absence from military service, will remain only three or four months and during that time will make an extended tour, during which he will be heard in practically all of the larger cities of the United States. Since the beginning of the war he has been almost continually at the front. This is the first visit of a distinguished foreign organist to the United States since the last tour of the late Alexandre Guilmant at the time of the St. Louis Exposition. There is much interest to hear him and already a lively demand for his services as recitalist.

Serious Playing in the Theater.

M. P. Moller reports the completion of his fourteenth organ contract for William Fox, in the New Terminal Theater, at Newark, New Jersey.

This instrument, like the others, is a three-manual arranged partly on the stage and partly in the house in such a manner that either section is a complete two-manual organ.

The Fox policy in exhibiting pictures is generally considered very advanced musically. His larger theaters each have an orchestra of twenty or thirty men under competent directors, and the organists are men of high attainments. On his staff more than twenty organists are men who have held important cathedral positions in Europe or England and the other players are without exception men who have held important positions as church or concert players.

It is interesting to note that in William Fox theaters the organists are expected to play in a "legitimate" manner. Waltzes and rags on the organ are taboo. The player is expected to exploit the dignity and grandeur of his instrument in the serious and subjective parts of the picture. This is on the theory that the organ has its greatest usefulness not as an imitator of the orchestra, but as a foil or contrast to it.

In these theaters the organists are not encouraged to thunder on their instruments and are under strong injunction as to heavy pedal work. Quiet and unobtrusive melody is the desideratum and anything calculated to detract attention from the picture is discouraged.

Music Every Musician Should Know.

Mignon Overture—Thomas.

"Mignon" was the composer's most successful opera. It won success at its premiere at the Paris Opera Comique in 1866, and its fame and popularity traveled into the nooks and corners of the universe where opera is given. Save for occasional performances of "Hamlet," "Mignon" is probably the only one of this famous musician's operas which still thrives outside of his own country. And the Overture is even more universally heard than the opera itself.

It has been suggested that this overture might more aptly be called "Introduction," since it has none of the earmarks of the classic overture form, but the term "Overture" has become so elastic that it does not seem out of place here. The thematic material of the "Mignon" Overture is taken from the opera, and its chief themes, following a brief, effective introduction, are "Know'st Thou the Land" (which is sung by Mignon) and the Polacca, or polonaise, which is the vehicle for the display of the coloratura voice of Filina, and is sung by her in the second act. It is a graceful overture and is received with as much favor in the concert room as it is in the theater.

Hawaiian Orchestra Music.

The following Hawaiian orchestra music is published by Carl Fischer, New York City:

One, Two, Three, Four (Hawaiian Waltz); Hilo Hawaiian (One Step); Like-No-a-Like (Hawaiian Love Song); Kahola Honolulu (Hawaiian), a selection of Hawaiian numbers arranged by M. L. Lake, (Waltzes); Kilauea (Hawaiian Patrol); Aloha Oe (Waltz), and "Hawaiian," a selection of Hawaiian numbers arranged by M. L. Lake, containing the following:

My Honolulu Tomboy; Lei Aloha; My Tropical Hula Girl; The Old Plantation; On the Beach at Waikiki; Like-no-a-like; One, Two, Three, Four; Aloha Oe; Hula o Makee; Pua Mohola; Kauli I Ka Huahuai; Lika I Ke Ahola; My Honolulu Girl; Hawaii Pono! (National Hymn., and My Hawaiian Maid.

World's Music Center Is Now New York City.

AT THE outbreak of the war a few wise persons predicted that it would have the effect, temporarily at least, of making New York the center of culture of the world. This high position has now been realized in the field of music at least," says Herman Sandby, the Danish cellist and composer.

Mr. Sandby has been coming to this country annually for the past seven years and is able to compare the present New York with the New York that foreigners saw before the war.

"Never were there so many distinguished foreign or native artists in London, in Paris, in Rome, Berlin, Petrograd, or any of the great European cities as there are now in New York," he declares. "The war has sent practically every important artist in Europe to this country, and that means, of course, to New York.

"The public, as a consequence, is able to hear one night, the greatest artists of Italy, for instance; the next, the greatest of Austria; the next, the greatest of Russia, and so on throughout the season. It is, for music lovers, the most remarkable jubilee that history has ever produced.

"The result? New York—all of America, in fact (for most of the artists go on tour through the land)—will have better taste in music hereafter than would have been possible for a century under normal conditions.

"Americans are lovers of music, but never before have they been able to get enough of the sort that appealed to discerning taste.

"However, it will be difficult for any humble artist who might have got along quite well before, to make a 'hit' in America after the war when many of the foreigners will go home again.

"New York by that time will have become so critical that beginners will have a hard time indeed. This, however, may produce real genius in the end."

New York, moreover, will not lose its recently gained position in the world of music. The world's artists will come back regularly. One doesn't visit New York once only.

Clarence Eddy's Tour.

The tour of Clarence Eddy, the famous organist, beginning at the Pacific Coast, has opened auspiciously, and is proving to be a huge success, as may be expected by those who have heard him play.

Some may ask, "Who is Clarence Eddy?" The name Clarence Eddy is known and honored throughout the entire musical world.

He is recognized, by the best authorities, as one of the world's greatest organists, and his reputation extends to every civilized country. His first lessons on the organ were under J. Gilbert Wilson, and Dudley Buck of Hartford.

Mr. Eddy commenced drawing a salary as organist at the age of fourteen. He was for two years organist of Bethany Church of Montpelier, Vermont, and then went to Berlin, where he studied the organ and composition under August Haupt, the master organist of Germany, and the piano under Albert Loeschorn.

After numerous highly successful concert tours covering Germany, Austria, Switzerland, Holland, England and Italy, Mr. Eddy returned to this country where he located in Chicago.

At the age of twenty-two Mr. Eddy gave a series of one hundred recitals in Chicago, without a single repetition. This made him famous, and his reputation rapidly grew, by reason of his numerous recitals all over the country, and he was called to dedicate new organs in nearly every state in the Union. He has undoubtedly opened more new organs than any other living organist.

Mr. Eddy in Chicago gave upwards of four hundred recitals, including in his repertoire practically everything written for the organ, as well as hundreds of manuscripts which have been dedicated to him. His four organ collections, published by Edward Schuberth & Co., of New York, and one by the Oliver Ditson Company, of Boston, are extensively used throughout the United States.

Mr. Eddy has been identified, officially, with every important exposition since the one in Vienna in 1873, namely: those at Philadelphia in 1876, Paris in 1889, Chicago in 1893 with twenty-one recitals, Buffalo in 1901, St. Louis in 1904, Jamestown in 1907 with six recitals, and more recently at our own Panama Pacific International Exposition in San Francisco with forty recitals, where his concerts were among the best advertised attractions of the great fair.

Following a recital given at the famous Saint Cecilia Academy, Rome, Mr. Eddy was made an honorary member, a distinction considered, in musical circles, one of the greatest honors that can be conferred upon a musician in any country, and among the encomiums he received following the recital was this expression from the great composer, Sgambati: "He is one of the greatest organists of the present epoch." Also, this noteworthy expression from E. di San Martino, president of the Royal Academy of St. Cecilia: "Mr. Eddy is the most marvelous and versatile executant of the organ we have ever entertained. We consider ourselves honored in placing his name on our list of distinguished members." August Haupt declared that, "In organ playing the performances of Mr. Eddy are worthy to be designated as eminent, and he is undoubtedly a peer of the greatest living organists."

Clarence Eddy is now organist at the First Presbyterian Church, Oakland, California, where the wonderful organ of this new and costly edifice is being employed, under Mr. Eddy's magic skill, as one of the greatest institutions for the interpretation and inspiration of high class music in the West. His semi-monthly recitals are being enjoyed with increasing attendance and interest.

California should be extremely gratified in acquiring this great master, and may be justly proud in realizing that our matchless climate can overcome the claims that the East and Europe have on this renowned artist, and be able to induce him to bring to us from his many tours of the world, as a great storehouse of accumulated accomplishments and experiences, his great talent, so completely matured and perfected.

Musicians, and especially organists, should not fail to hear this great organist, should the opportunity present itself.

New Rules in Counterpoint.

An English society, known as the Council of the Union of Graduates in Music, has issued an interesting document relative to strict counterpoint.

The musician who has completed his work in harmony and has proceeded to study the text-books of the older contrapuntists (Cherubini, Albrechtsberger, etc.), has always wondered at the strict process of counterpoint of their school and probably noticed the inadaptability of these processes in modern writing.

The Council above mentioned had discussed this question. While it disclaims any direct influence on teachers, private or institutional, it expresses its views on counterpoint written against a Cantus Firmus, as follows:

1. The parts may cross with reason in counterpoint for more than two voices.

2. While it is preferable that the first note of the counterpoint shall make a perfect concord, the use of the third of the chord is not considered to be an offence.

3. Modulation to nearly related keys may be sparingly used after the original key has been established.

4. Syncopation, in examples of the fourth species, may be occasionally broken.

5. In combined counterpoint, dotted half notes and dotted quarter notes may be used, the latter sparingly.

6. A quarter note should seldom be tied to a quarter note.

7. Two chords may be used in a bar (measure), although it is recognized that the use of one chord in a bar is often stronger in effect.

8. More than two consecutive eighth notes should not be used; and these groups of two eighth notes should occur on the second and fourth beats of the bar in conjunct motion.

9. Changing notes may be used, but except in the cadence they should be rare.

10. A second inversion should not occur on the first beat of any bar, unless the fourth of the chord having been previously prepared, is resolved in the same bar.

11. The objection to consecutive perfect fifths does not depend on the number of notes intervening, but on the character of fifths themselves; for instance, two perfect fifths are always permissible with one or more notes intervening, provided that at least one of the fifths is unessential.

This document is signed by the Professor of Music in the Universities of Oxford, Dublin, London, Durham and Manchester.

This document also advocates essential principles that bring the order of strict counterpoint within the domain of practical writing. Furthermore, it narrows the hitherto existing chasm between harmony as taught to-day and counterpoint as it was taught by Cherubini.

A Well Arranged Program.

Following is a program adopted in many of the larger moving picture theaters throughout the country. At a glance, one realizes the important part music is playing in the making up of perfect program:

1—Overture; 2—Travelogue; 3—Cartoon; 4—Topical Review or Weekly; 5—Soprano or Contralto Solo; 6—Feature; 7—Vocal or Instrumental Solo (Organ or Violin); 8—Comedy.

Conducted by CLARENCE E. SINN and NORMAN STUCKEY.

ANY questions concerning music for the film, suitable instrumentation for motion picture theaters, questions relating to the pipe organ; in fact, any questions, criticisms or suggestions dealing with musical interpretation for moving pictures will be answered by Mr. Stuckey through this department. Inquiries should be addressed to Musical Editor, Moving Picture World, 17 Madison avenue, New York City.

Furst's Score of "Joan, the Woman."

"JOAN, THE WOMAN" was recently produced in Los Angeles, and Gilbert Brown, of the Tribune, has much to say regarding Mr. Furst's score. Chicago, San Francisco, Boston and other large cities will have a chance to hear Mr. Furst's score before spring, and in each city Mr. Furst will personally rehearse the orchestra and direct the music on the opening night.

Mr. Brown says: "Ever since big single motion picture productions began to bid for the privilege of entertaining the public for an entire evening, I have cherished the ambition of seeing a fine feature film in the presentation of which music should take what seemed to me to be its rightful place.

That ambition was realized when I saw and heard "Joan, the Woman." This splendid, stirring screen epic, with its attendant music by William Furst, seems to me to be the finest union of the two arts—the oldest and the newest—that the public has yet witnessed.

In all but a few previous productions of this type the music has been "arranged"—that is, an adapter has selected from the world of musical literature what he believed to be suitable themes for various characters and big incidents in the screen drama, and then has hitched them together, orchestrating them when necessary.

It is not to be denied that some splendid effects have been obtained by this method, but all too frequently the heroine's theme was taken from some well known opera or stage music, and the listener was distracted by the inevitable association of the borrowed theme.

Motion picture directors objected that no composer could in a few short months produce a score sufficiently rich in new melodies to be regarded as high class music; it was much better, they thought, to borrow from the best music of the world.

To back up this argument they pointed to the sad failure of such films as had been provided with special scores. To me it always seemed that the failure was due rather to the lack of inspiration in the subject.

"Joan, the Woman," however, is a photoplay to inspire the ablest composer, and William Furst has provided a score that richly mirrors the lofty ideal set forth on the screen.

It is as difficult to particularize the merits of Mr. Furst's music a few moments after one's first view of the drama as it would be to give a detailed analysis of a grand opera score under the same circumstances.

Foremost among the many impressions received, however, is that of the perfect union of both factors, film and music, into something greater than either. Even one who attends for the chief purpose of judging the music finds its attention centering, time and time again, on the screen, the music weaves itself into the picture so that he is unconscious of it as music.

At other times—and always when the composer so intended—the music becomes an equal partner, as in the glorious hymn-like marches when Joan, in shining armor, leads the armies of France to victory, and in the scenes preceding the burning of the Maid, when the ceaseless throbbing of the kettle drum keeps time with the spectator's laden heart.

There never was a moment during the course of the drama when the music was not in keeping with the lofty dignity and beautiful idealism of the play.

Mr. Furst's score is Wagnerian to the extent of a complete scheme of musical "motifs," which appear in the music simultaneously with the entrance onto the screen of the characters to whom they are ascribed.

In the invention of these themes the composer has entered remarkably into the spirit of the various characters and their relation to the action and driving purposes of the drama. The theme of the Voices, in particular, is exalting in the extreme, and its introduction into the various scenes—Joan's torture and during her night of terror preceding her execution—produces a curiously uplifting effect.

The composer will doubtless be subjected to criticism for his use of the Marseillaise to represent the spirit which gives the Maid strength to redeem France from the enemy. Liberal minded souls will point out that this is a terrible anachronism, that the Marseillaise was not written until 350 years after Joan's era.

The world is agreed that this song typifies today the spirit of France, and the spirit of France born in Joan's breast was the same flame that inspired Rouget de Lisle and that inspires France today.

Therefore, why may not a melody that spells the soul of France now be used to typify that same soul 500 years ago?

New Type of Theater Organ.

Good music will always pay its own way, whereas no music at all is what many of the picture theaters give us at the present time.

We believe it is admitted that best results are now obtained by using an organ, which can follow the picture and quickly interpret the varied emotional action on the screen.

What we mean by organ is such as is used in the Rialto, Strand, Academy of Music, Broadway, Audubon, etc., but the orchestral department of the organ must, to a considerable degree, represent the tones of the orchestral instruments. An out and out church organ will not do. The average church organ is too heavy and lacking in light and frolicsome character which is absolutely necessary to entertain theater audiences.

Such an instrument has finally been developed and found absolutely satisfactory. This new instrument is the "Unit Organ," built by the Wagnerin-Weickhardt Co., and designed by Eugene F. Licome, one of the pioneers who introduced the organ into New York theaters.

This organ has no noise producing effects such as auto horn, fire gong, whistles, etc., but it is certainly rich in real musical effects. Many orchestral tones of the orchestral instruments themselves are faithfully reproduced, as well as that of the church organ. There is a wonderful variety in an instrument of this character, very much more than that obtained by an orchestra of six or eight musicians. It is also effective when used with three or more musicians, because it blends perfectly with them that the character of the tones accentuate the orchestral quality and makes an orchestra of four men sound like twelve first-class musicians.

The following specification of the Unit Organ is suitable for and can be afforded easily for the average six hundred seat house:

High Class Music a Feature.

By S. L. Rothappel.

UP TO two or three years ago the average man paid little attention to the better kind of music. He could whistle the popular song of the moment, he was familiar with fragments of the current light opera successes, and there were certain grand opera strains which had been impressed on his memory because he had been hearing them all his life. These and a few national airs and folk songs of various countries represented practically all he knew about music.

The reason for this is obvious. Grand opera was expensive. Symphony concerts were regarded as too "high-brow" for the average taste. Other concerts of various sorts were given at regular intervals in scattered locations and only during a limited season. To attend them meant definite planning ahead; and to the average man the amount of pleasure to be derived from them was not worth the bother. They were supported by musicians and genuine lovers of music, to whom each concert was an important occasion.

The combining of a motion picture entertainment with a high class musical programme has changed this condition in a way that is amazing. Today the average man can and does go to hear music of the most artistic quality any afternoon or evening that he feels like it, any day in the week, any week in the year. More than a quarter of a million persons come to the Rialto every month—an increasing large percentage of whom "repeat," because they were attracted by the music we give them. The educational effect of this cannot be estimated. The enjoyment our patrons have experienced from the playing of our orchestra and the singing of our soloists has done more, perhaps, to instill in them a love of good music than any other one factor whose influence has been brought to bear.

The phonograph has had a tremendous and widespread influence in the same direction; but hearing an orchestral number on the phonograph and hearing it—as one does at the Rialto—with all the embellishment of color and scenery that we can give it, and the life and motion lent to the effect by the presence of the musicians themselves, are two experiences not to be compared in the same breath.

It has been extremely interesting to watch the gradual broadening of appreciation developed in our audiences. The grade of music we give our patrons would have been wasted on them—on most of them—two years ago. We had to lead them up to it gradually by a prolonged series of experiments. Our earlier musical offerings in the theaters with which I have been connected in New York were on the border line between the sort of thing which has a general appeal to the masses and the better sort, which demands of its hearers a little more refinement of perception, a little more cultivation of taste. They never were lowered below a certain standard merely for the applause which would have resulted from cheaper selections. Far better "over their heads" than "down to their taste." There was plenty of ragtime and popular stuff of the sort in the incidental music to the comedies, scenic pictures and topical reviews.

We managed to reach all preferences in that manner, just as we do today. Our orchestra can play an operatic overture in a way to satisfy the most critical of musicians, but also can play lighter numbers in a way that sets the toes of the audience tapping all over the house.

Occasionally we introduced selections of too classical a nature, to "get over" with our audiences. We did it deliberately, and we kept the selection on all week, whether it was liberally applauded or not. We knew that the next time our patrons heard it they were bound to like it better. We do the same thing today; but so rapidly have our audiences kept pace with us that the numbers which do not "go big" are now practically negligible.

It is a remarkable fact that not once since the Rialto was opened have we had to take a musical number off our programme because its reception did not warrant its retention. When the idea of better music with motion pictures was young, we sometimes took off a selection which obviously was not appreciated by the majority of those who heard it—or even by a sufficiently large minority. That never happens now. Our audiences today contain so many persons who have always liked good music, and so many whom we have taught to like it, that within certain natural limitations we can give them almost anything we choose, with the assurance beforehand that it will be thoroughly appreciated.

The result of all this is that not only in New York, but in all parts of the country, motion picture audiences have begun to demand better music. In every new theater that is built, provision is made for an orchestra of from a dozen to twenty-five pieces. People have come to know good music when they hear it. They are not satisfied with the inferior quality formerly accepted without comment. Not only in motion picture houses, but everywhere else, better music meets with keener appreciation.

Where are the cheap ballads and popular ragtime hits which used to sweep the country from end to end so that one couldn't escape hearing them day and night? They are not being taken up as they used to be. There hasn't been an "Alexander's Ragtime Band" in the last two years. Why not? Because operatic airs, high class ballads, and standard compositions of all sorts are being whistled and hummed to an extent never before heard in this country.

The whole standard of taste in music has risen rapidly of late, and for this gratifying condition we believe the musical programme at the Rialto and other houses which pattern after us may fairly claim a large share of the credit.

Saint-Saens on Improvising.

The art of improvising has of late engaged the attention of theater organists. It is now included in the course of instruction in many colleges of music, and some excellent modern works have appeared on the subject. What is known as "commonplace" improvisation has perhaps been too severely frowned upon by many organists. That even an uninspired and extemporaneous performance sounds better than a set piece which may not suit the occasion is the opinion of at least one notable authority. We read in a contemporary:

"Saint-Saens has a rather curious plea for improvisation on the organ. The organist," he says, "must improvise if he is to use freely the tone colors of his instrument. In recent years young organists have been deterred from practicing the art. They have been told that an improvisation has not the worth of a piece by Bach or Mendelssohn. I should say not, judging from the vapid, formless things one has heard in that way. But Saint-Saens' experiences have evidently been fortunate. 'Lefebure-Wely, who was a marvellous improvisator—I can say this, for I have heard him—left behind him only insignificant compositions for the organ; and I could cite among contemporaries those who wholly reveal themselves only by improvisation. The organ is an evocator; in contact with it the imagination awakes.' That there are poor improvisators, Saint-Saens holds to be immaterial.

"A mediocre improvisation is always endurable when the organist is imbued with the idea that music should be in accordance with the office.

"Saint-Saens adds that during the twenty years or more he was organist at the Madeleine, he almost always improvised, and this was one of the joys of his existence. But there was a legend. He was a severe, austere musician and the public had been led to believe that he constantly played fugues. Thus it happened that a young girl came to him and begged him not to play a fugue at her wedding. It is true that another asked him to play funeral marches. She wished to weep at her wedding; and, as she would not feel tearful, she depended on the organ for the waterworks. A vicar of the parish said to Saint-Saens one day: 'The congregation of the Madeleine is composed for the most part of rich persons who often go to the Opera Comique. They have acquired musical tastes that should be respected.' To which Saint-Saens made answer: 'Monsieur l'Abbe, when I shall hear in the pulpit the dialogue of the Opera Comique, I shall play appropriate music, but not until then.'"

Music Every Musician Should Know.

"Zampa" Overture—Harold.

Zampa was a notorious pirate, whose exploits made him the dread of all Italy. The French composer, Joseph Ferdinand Herold (1791-1833) based his opera "Zampa, or the Marble Bride," upon incidents in the life of this brigand.

The overture is one of the most tuneful and popular compositions. It is a splendid example of the use not only of the different orchestral "choirs" as such, but the use of individual instruments for solo work and particularly clarinet.

It opens with an impetuous introduction for full orchestra, during which the flute has a short solo, followed again by all. After this comes a short episode for strings, flutes and brass, which leads into the proper motive.

Further along we have a melodious solo for clarinet alone, accompanied by the strings. This is a favorite with clarinet players.

This is followed by a dainty flute solo, working up to a crescendo, introducing all of the orchestra. Finally comes the blare of the trumpets, which leads into the spirited finale.

By Clarence E. Sinn.

IT HAS been repeatedly said here that in improvising for pictures one should use at least one principal theme to run through the story. Usually this can be given to one of the leading characters and will be recognized as that character's music. It is best to play this theme in such a manner that it can be recognized when used in the dominant scenes. It may be altered in such a way as to merely hint at the theme, yet still be recognizable. Often this is very effective, particularly if the scene works up so as to permit of a musical climax. In orchestra work it is easy to make differences in effect by giving the theme to different instruments in turn, and thus portray emotional variations by the tonal coloring of different instruments.

Ex. 7.

A theme played softly on muted violin has one effect. On the 'cello

Ex. 9.

another. On the oboe, flute or clarinet it expresses a different emotion, while the same theme played fortissimo by the brass section, accompanied by the full orchestra, conveys an idea entirely opposite to the others. The organ can follow along the same lines to a very great degree; the piano not at all. With this instrument the differences must be marked by changes of expression and of tempo. But alterations of the theme itself are often useful as well as effective, as has been argued before in our department. A few examples are included in this article showing a theme in the overture "The Beautiful Galatea" by Von Suppe. Example 7 is the opening to the second movement in the overture. The theme in question is given in the left hand (lower staff) in Ex. 7. As given it is really in the key of F sharp major modulating to the key of A flat. In the repetition (5th and 6th measures) a minor 6th occurs (E flat to F flat) which distinguishes it from the major 6th (C sharp to D sharp) as shown in the first measure. This same theme occurs throughout the movement

Ex. 10.

(2d movement in the overture) with but little variation, except that it may start in different parts of the measure. (See Fig. 8.)

A development of the theme is shown in the 4th movement of the overture—a waltz movement. (See Ex. 9.)

Ex. 11.

This same variant is shown in the finale of the overture, where it is given to the basses, fortissimo, and vivace. (See Ex. 10.)

A hint or slight suggestion of the subject of the theme may be found also in the 3d movement of the overture (the 6/8 in G minor). See Ex. 11 and notice the dotted lines running from the accented notes in the melody (a) to those in the skeleton of the theme (b). You will there find a very pronounced suggestion of the original subject as shown in other examples.

A Lobby Musical Program.

"Most beautiful houses west of the Mississippi" is the rather high claim printed on the letterheads of the Royal and Regent theaters of Kansas City. Frank L. Newman, president and manager; T. H. Cochran, vice-president and treasurer, and W. P. Fullerton, secretary. A mammoth pipe organ and a ten-piece orchestra indicate the attention given to the musical side of the program. Mr. Cecil Summers, house manager for President Newman, sends the accompanying illustration of frame used in their lobby to stimulate interest in the musical part of the program and the selections given by the orchestra from week to week. The frame is 14x22 inches and the management has been surprised at the interest it has created. The names of selections are neatly printed with pen and ink on white cardboard, with a few underscored lines in a blue ink. A good effect is obtained by using ruling pens of different sizes for both the lettering and rules and simple border designs. The idea is an excellent one. The program in the illustration was given with the Fox feature "Darling of Paris."

Supreme Court Decision That May Eventually Affect Theaters.

The Supreme Court of the United States recently rendered a decision that will probably affect theaters using copyrighted music.

In a decision rendered January 22, 1917, Victor Herbert et al. vs. The Shanley Company, Mr. Justice Holmes found that the playing or singing of copyrighted songs and other musical numbers in a restaurant, hotel, cabaret, etc., without permission of the copyright owner, subjects the proprietor of such establishment to very serious penalties.

This decision has the support of the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers, organized to protect composers, authors and publishers against such playing of their compositions, and for the purpose of licensing the public performance of the works of its members, who comprise most of the well-known authors, composers and publishers of America, England, Italy and Austria.

Just how this law will affect the many moving picture theaters in this country is a point yet to be decided by the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers, but it is likely that a small fee, or license, will entitle the musician, or theater owner, to use and play such musical compositions as he wishes; that is, all compositions, published or written by the members of this society. It is probable that the size of the house will be considered and the license fee regulated according to the seating capacity.

Mr. Justice Holmes delivered the opinion of the Court:

These two cases (Victor Herbert, Harry E. Smith, et al., vs. The Shanley Company. The John Church Company vs. Hilliard Hotel Company) present the same question: whether the performance of a copyrighted musical composition in a restaurant or hotel without charge for admission to hear it infringes the exclusive right of the owner of the copyright to perform the work publicly for profit. Act of March 4, 1909, c. No. 1 (e), 35 Sta. 1075. The last case was decided before the other and may be stated first. The plaintiff owns the copyright of a lyric comedy in which is a march called "From Maine to Georgia." It took out a separate copyright for the march and published it separately. The defendant hotel company caused this march to be performed in the dining room of the Vanderbilt Hotel for the entertainment of guests during meal times, in a way common, by an orchestra employed and paid by this company. It was held by the Circuit Court of Appeals, reversing the decision of the District Court, that this was not a performance within the meaning of the Act 221 Fed. Rep. 229, 136 C. C. A. 639.

The other case is similar so far as the present discussion is concerned. The plaintiffs were the composers and owners of a comic opera entitled "Sweethearts," containing a song of the same title as a leading feature in the performance. There is a copyright for the opera and also one for the song, which is published and sold separately. This the Shanley Company caused to be sung by professional singers, upon a stage in its restaurant on Broadway, accompanied by an orchestra. The District Court, after holding that by the separate publication of the plaintiff's rights were limited to those conferred by the separate copyright, a matter that it will not be necessary to discuss, followed the decision 221 Fed. Rep. 229, as to public performance for profit. 222 Fed. Rep. 344. The decree was affirmed by the Circuit Court of Appeals, 229 Fed. Rep. 340, 143 C. C. A. 460.

If the rights under the copyright law are infringed only by performances where money is taken at the door, they are very imperfectly protected. Performances not different in kind from those of the defendants could be given that might compete with and even destroy the success of the monopoly that the law intends the plaintiffs to have. It is enough to say that there is no need to construe the statute so narrowly. The defendants' performances are not eleemosynary. They are part of a total for which the public pays, and the fact that the price of the whole is attributed to a particular item which those present are expected to order is not important. It is true that the music is not the sole object, but neither is the food, which probably could be got cheaper elsewhere. The object is a repast in surroundings that people having limited powers of conversation or disliking the rival noise give a luxurious pleasure not to be had from eating a silent meal. If music did not pay it would be given up. If it pays it pays out of the public's pocket. Whether it pays or not, the purpose of employing it is profit, and that is enough.

"Section 25. That if any person shall infringe the copyright in any work protected under the copyright law of the United States such person is liable:

"(a) To an injunction restraining such infringement.

"(b) To pay to the copyright proprietor such damages as the copyright proprietor may have suffered due to the infringement, as well as all the profits which the infringer shall have made from such an infringement * * * or in lieu of actual damages and profits such damages, the Court may, in its discretion, allow the amounts as hereinafter stated, and such damages shall not exceed the sum of five thousand dollars, nor be less than two hundred and fifty dollars, and shall not be regarded as a penalty; * * *

"Fourth: In the case of dramatic or dramatic-musical or a choral or orchestral composition, one hundred dollars for the first and fifty dollars for every subsequent infringing performance; in the case of other musical compositions, ten dollars for every infringing performance.

"Section 28. That any person who wilfully and for profit shall infringe any copyright secured by this Act, or who shall knowingly and wilfully aid or abet such infringement, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by imprisonment for not exceeding one year or by a fine of not less than one hundred dollars nor more than one thousand dollars, or both, in the discretion of the Court; provided, however, that nothing in this Act shall be so construed as to prevent the performance of religious or secular works, such as oratorios, cantatas, masses or octavo choruses by public schools, church choirs or vocal societies, rented, borrowed or obtained from some public library, public school, church choir, school choir, or vocal society, provided the performance is given for charitable or educational purposes and not for profit."

Classic Melodies for the Organists' Use.

It is interesting to think of a list of great andante melodies fitting for plaintive scenes. It is perhaps a little like the list of the hundred best books, and, to be sure, it is somewhat a personal matter, one of individual experience. But in spite of the lack of applause, there is no difficulty in the test. The organist is sure to know when he has touched his hearers.

First of all, it seems, come the andantes from the great sonatas and symphonies—chiefly of Beethoven. The symphonies are a less fruitful field than the sonatas. Of the former, there are the slow movements, in particular of the Sixth, the Seventh and the Second symphonies. Of the sonatas there are the Andante of the Pathétique, of Opus 26; the Menuetto in Opus 31, No. 3, and the Andante in the Sonata Appassionata. To these may be added the Largo of Opus 2, No. 2. These have always seemed to us in the essence of the most beautiful andante music.

But while Beethoven's melody is the familiar type, his are not the only examples. The Andante of Mozart's Symphony in E flat is equal in beauty and earlier in the time of its creation. In Beethoven's violin sonata there is also the great theme of the Kreutzer Sonata and the Adagio of No. 7. The Andante of the 10th Trio, Opus 97, is also a melody wonderfully suited to the organ. Handel's Largo, and the Harmonious Blacksmith hardly need a reminder. In Bach's works there are very few examples that may be used for this special purpose; the best is probably the melody known as the Air for the G Strings.

In Haydn's symphonies there is here and there a slow melody well suited to the organ. An example is the Andante in G, from the Symphony in D No. 2 (B. & H. edition).

Of Schubert's music, the first part of the Impromptu in A flat, No. 142, is an ideal melody for the organ. The beautiful "Rosamunde" air (in both its verses) is also suitable. A perfect organ melody is the theme of Schubert's song, "Death and the Maiden." The Andante melodies of both the great symphonies of Schubert are effective on the organ. The second movement of the "Unfinished" may be played throughout, but it should be played from the score for the true effect, and this requires due preparation. As we leave the group of classic masters, we find less of this simple kind of melody. Schumann's "Traumerei," to be sure, needs a long rest from overwork, and other of his melodies—the "Nachstück" or "Warum"—are graceful on the organ.

Mendelssohn's "Songs Without Words" afford an example here and there; and the andante theme from the Italian symphony or from the violin concerto, and the Notturmo from the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music may be played with effect.

All these melodies have a splendid place during plaintive scenes, and the organist who interprets properly the above-mentioned music will raise the standard of his playing high above the usual organ music heard in the picture theater.

Music for the Picture

Selecting the Music.

By Clarence E. Sinn.

AT PRESENT a majority of the medium sized picture theaters—and some of the larger as well—pursue a policy of changing programs daily. These programs usually include a "feature" consisting of five or six reels, which, taken with the single reels, make a longer show and fewer performances than the exhibition of a few years ago. These conditions make the musicians' task more difficult for the reason that he sees but a few presentations of the picture, and by the time he has a reasonable idea of the musical requirements of the pictures, the show is ended. If it was a difficult proposition in the past to lay out fitting musical accompaniments to the one and two-reelers when we often played the same program from six to fourteen times a day, how much more difficult to select music for a show which runs nearly twice as long and which we can only see about half as many times. One must of necessity see a picture through before he really knows what it is about and exactly what music he needs for its accompaniment. I am referring, of course, to performers who play entirely from notes and who must have those notes ready at hand before the show begins. A great many simply pick out as good a concert number as is available—regardless of its relationship to the picture—and let it go at that. His idea being that if he has given a good musical program, he has done all that is required. While it is true that the first requirement of picture music is that it shall be good music, another—quite as urgent, but often overlooked—is that it shall be appropriate music.

Many performers memorize a stock of standard musical numbers which permits them to watch the pictures unhampered by the necessity of watching their notes, for the first run, at least. It seems to me this is a safe rule to follow. Later, having decided on the proper music for its accompaniment, he can select his program to fit the picture. Sometimes his selection includes memorized numbers—often they include improvisations, though these last usually take the form of connecting links between numbers of contrasting character. I have always contended that the performer who combines these three processes (i. e.: reading, playing from memory and improvising) will—if he uses discretion—get better results than from any other method.

It is understood, of course, that we are referring to the performer who plays for the same picture but one day. A "run" of any length with its attending rehearsals is another proposition entirely.

The orchestra leader who cares enough for the show to try to help it would do well to have a goodly number of things memorized, and to have his musicians learn them too. He could thus watch the picture on its first run in his theater, change instantly, if necessary, from one fairly appropriate number to another, and after the picture was shown take enough time off to select other numbers which in his opinion will fit the picture, at least approximately. If you are making a feature of the orchestra, you want to make your best showing in the "feature" picture, and surely your manager will not begrudge you the necessary time off to select fitting music for that feature. He wants the orchestra to make a good showing. But you cannot make a really good showing if you pick out your program hap-hazard before the show (as so many are accustomed to doing) for in this way nothing could be appropriate except through accident. But having seen the picture the first show without being hampered with reading music, you all have a fair idea of its character, and with a flexible orchestra used to "following the leader," you should be able to accompany your picture intelligently. In selecting fitting music, the important thing to bear in mind is that you need not go to extremes. If your music does not oppose the picture—if it doesn't disagree with the picture—if it doesn't "kid" or swear at it, there is a possibility that you can make it almost fit. And that is something. Remember, it isn't always what you play so much as how you play it, that counts. You know you don't want to play fast stuff in the slow scenes, nor noisy music in the quiet scenes. Likewise, you know that slow, sentimental or pathetic music will kill a gay and lively scene. It shouldn't be difficult to avoid the glaringly inappropriate in your music, and when you have done this you have won more than half the battle. All the intelligent part of your audience will recognize inappropriate or incongruous music. Very few—even among musicians —will agree on what is exactly appropriate. Some will favor a certain number for a certain scene, others may prefer another. These are merely personal opinions, and their value depends upon the holder's experience in this particular line of business. But the glaring faults can be discerned by any one and should be corrected.

Carl Edouarde, Strand Theater, New York City.

Carl Edouarde, the musical director of the Strand Theater Concert Orchestra, is a pioneer in the art of setting music to moving pictures and was the first man in the business to study the various themes of the pictures and interpret them musically.

Mr. Edouarde has conducted the Concert Orchestra at the Strand theater ever since the opening of the house nearly three years ago. He first entered the moving picture field in November, 1913, when he took charge of the orchestra at the Regent theater. It was at this house that Mr. Edouarde gave the music to moving pictures real serious consideration, and the first time a picture with a musical setting was shown at this house it was hailed with delight by the audience and the news of the new method of presenting music to the pictures soon spread over New York and the Regent was considered the best picture house in New York.

Mr. Edouarde is primarily a musician of the highest rank and no business man. He was not given credit for his work nor indeed did he seek any. The credit went to another man who could not read a note of music. This man saw the importance of appropriate music to moving pictures and had the good judgment and bad taste to claim the credit.

When the Strand opened in April, 1914, Mr. Edouarde had better facilities to carry out his ideas. Chief among the things that have distinguished the Strand from any other moving picture theaters is the musical program. The fitting of music to a feature picture has become an industry almost, since the inception of the idea of the Strand. Selection from an average of fifty compositions a week is necessary for the incidental music played during the showing of a five reel feature picture. This phase of the work has been under Mr. Edouarde, who has built up a library which is the largest of its kind in the United States. The orchestra has gradually been enlarged to a surprising extent. When the Strand was first opened to the public there were sixteen musicians in the orchestra—today there are thirty-three.

Before entering the moving picture field, Mr. Edouarde gained a solid musical foundation from a variety of studies and positions. He was born in Cleveland, Ohio. As a young man he began the study of the violin, later going to Europe to complete his musical education. He graduated from the Royal Conservatory in Leipzig, in 1900. Returning to this country he made a tour with Liberati's Band, as violin virtuoso.

Following his tour Mr. Edouarde assumed the professorship of harmony and theory in the Cleveland Conservatory of Music. He resigned this chair several years later to become conductor of Knapp's Millionaire Band, after which he organized the Carl Edouarde Concert Band. During his leadership of his band, Mr. Edouarde was the author of many popular compositions. He established an office in New York City to direct the bookings of his band. When the Strand was opened its owner offered the post of musical director to Mr. Edouarde, and he abandoned his organization to accept the position.

Music Every Musician Should Know.

Polish Dance—Scharwenka.

There are two Scharwenkas who are celebrated composers, Xaver Scharwenka, who composed this piece, and his brother, Ludwig Philipp Scharwenka. Both have written much music, but Xaver has achieved the greater number of successes.

His opera "Mataswintha" is highly spoken of, but his Polish Dance is known all over the world.

The work is somewhat in the Mazurka vein, with its many syncopations and accented structure of accompaniment. As a rule the musician should not take liberties with form, though he may vary it, within judicious limits, and obtain excellent effects thereby. Many musicians disregard rules, but in such cases the results justify their action.

Poupee Valsante—Poldini.

The Waltzing Doll, (which is a translation of the title of this piece), is a dainty tone picture which might be a companion piece to Liadow's "Musical Box." Like the latter, it represents automatic motion and it should be played in a mechanical and rhythmic style.

The automatic character of the dance is well indicated by the staccato phrases in the chief theme. The tempo must be rather quick throughout, and at times a legato style must be used in phrasing. The use of the pedal should help to give expression.

The Importance of Tone Coloring in Relation to Musical Interpretation.

By Norman Stuckey.

MUSICIANS interested in tone color and its application in portraying the varied emotions on the screen will find much to interest them in the study of symphonic music. The musician playing for moving pictures should never miss the opportunity of hearing as many symphonic concerts as possible.

From each concert he will derive many suggestions for his work in depicting emotion on the screen.

First in importance among symphonic music are Beethoven's nine symphonies. Beethoven, after he had emancipated himself from the influence of Haydn and Mozart, wrote a succession of musical epics, setting forth with the boldness, sureness and strength of a master hand, human life and its destiny, man's struggles with fate, the aspirations of the soul toward liberty, the nobility of human brotherhood, the grandeur and beauty of nature, and its mighty mysteries. His faith rested upon a pantheistic abstraction which he called "Love," and that emotion is the keynote of his work.

It imparted majesty, nobility, elevation, and profound seriousness to his music. His ideas not only reflected the sentiment of his own time, which is one of the tests of a great artist, but they were broad and far-reaching enough to comprehend the great world of humanity, like those of his favorite Shakespeare before him, and this it is that insures immortality.

Space does not permit me to deal with each of Beethoven's nine symphonies, but for illustrating tone color in relation to musical interpretation we will analyze the Sixth Symphony known as the Pastoral Symphony. There are five movements in this symphony, as follows:

1. Allegro ma non troppo (the cheerful impressions excited on arriving in the country).
2. Andante con moto (By the Brook).
3. Allegro (Peasant's Merrymaking).
4. Allegro (Thunder Storm).
5. Allegretto (The Shepherd's Song).

This symphony reveals Beethoven as a lyric poet. It is by no means the sentimental strain of the conventional Spring poet, but the masterly expression of that happy and contented feeling which the lover of nature experiences during a ramble through a lovely country. The motives employed are apparently of the simplest kind, but demonstrate the evolution of intense thought. They cannot be altered by a note without the sacrifice of their meaning.

The first movement is an allegro ma non troppo in F major, 2-4 time, and in keeping with the general description of cheerful impressions excited on arriving in the country.

The Andante molto moto in B flat, 12-8 time, gives voice to the listless dreaming of the wayfarer, who is resting at the banks of the brook.

The first violins give out the principal melodic theme, while the wind instruments respond with the second phrase. Short figures abound, fitting about with the different instruments, sometimes in imitation, again in euphonious thirds or sixths, and at time a brief trill or the short snapping of pizzicato notes. Its effect is that of the evening air alive with the songs of birds and the buzz of insects. In the last twelve measures of the movement, the composer even introduces the bird-songs—a proceeding which has been pronounced childish and unworthy of Beethoven, but which to the unprejudiced listener seems to belong in its connection. When we consider that its use by Beethoven cannot possibly have sprung from a desire to write catch-peany claptrap, it would perhaps be well to accept the intention of the composer.

The third movement, Allegro, in F major, 2-4 time, representing the Minuet, introduces the purely human element. The first eight measures usher in the good country people tripping briskly along. In the next phrase, the fair damsels carry their part of the program quite gracefully. Then we strike the dance proper with its "hand accompaniment." The minuet-like movement is interrupted by a short tempo d'allegro, 2-4, which seems like the change to another dance, though being more boisterous, it comes to a close by two short pauses, as if to give the dancers a chance to catch their breaths before returning to the triple time of the minuet closing the movement.

The next movement, an allegro in A flat, is entitled "Thunderstorm," and brings before us the lowering sky, the distant rumbling of thunder, the sultry air, and the cumulous clouds as they rise higher and higher above the horizon until we are almost in darkness, and the storm breaks forth in all its fury. It soon passes over, however, the clouds break, and sunshine illuminates the refreshed landscape. Without interruption, the closing measure leads into the last movement, a shepherd's song of joy and his feeling of relief from the dangers of the tempest. The movement closes with one of those dynamic contrasts in which Beethoven delighted.

Goldmark is another composer whose symphony, "The Country Wedding," lends itself well to descriptive tone coloring. Its brightness (freshness, make it a favorite among concert goers in this country and abroad. "The Country Wedding" is a suite of series of musical pictures woven and held together by the slightest of symphonic threads. Its program is a sketch of a country wedding. The march procession, the nuptial song, which we may imagine sung by the friends of the happy pair, the inevitable serenade, the discourse of the lovers in a garden, interrupted by the entrance of friends whose greetings lead up to a genuine country dance in the finale, are the various scenes in this series of cheerful pastoral pictures.

The various movements are so characteristic and tell their story so simply to the hearer that they hardly need detailed analysis. The first movement is a march with thirteen variations. Though treated very freely and fancifully the movement never loses the "country" spirit of the work.

The second movement, "Bridal Song," is a charming melody in genuine aria form. It is short, but graceful and delicate, and admirably fills its place in the fanciful scheme of the work.

The third movement, "Serenade," comes nearer the sonata form, and yet preserves the pastoral characteristics throughout.

The fourth movement, "In the Garden," well known by organists and orchestra musicians, is a charming picture of the lovers tenderly conversing with each other and exchanging vows of constancy. The scene changes and in the final movement we have the dance. It is very brilliant and picturesque in its effects and contains many charming episodes, among them a return to the garden music in the middle part.

Mendelssohn's Symphony, No. 3, in A minor (Scotch), is another descriptive musical masterpiece and was suggested by a visit to Scotland, where the composer went in 1829. The day after he arrived in Edinburgh he heard a competition of the Highland pipers, which, it may be imagined, gave him a good idea of the national melodies. The next day he visited Holyrood and the chapel where Mary was crowned. It was there that he found the beginning of the Scotch symphony, and on the spot he wrote down the first sixteen bars of the introduction, announcing the theme which not only opens but closes the movements and thus gives an unmistakable clue to its meaning. The melancholy grandeur of this introduction shows how the influence of the scene affected his imaginative and poetical mind.

The Scotch Symphony is not the only souvenir of the visit. To it we also owe the overture to "Fingal's Cave."

This symphony is intended to give expression to the romantic and poetic phases of Scotch life. Its introduction begins with an andante theme, a melody of somber and melancholy cast, which admirably reflects the influence of his visit to Holyrood.

The second movement, the scherzo, is purely a caprice, and while at the same time it differs from all his other scherzos in the absence of their sportive, fantastic quality, it is a picture of pastoral nature, characterized by a continuous flow of rural gaiety. As one writer has characterized it: "It is a most wonderful compound of health and life, heath and moor, blowing wind, screaming eagles, babbles, fluttering tartans and elastic steps of racing Highlanders, all rounded off and brought into one perfect picture with consummate art." Schumann says: "I doubt whether a scherzo full of genius has been written in modern times."

The third movement (adagio cantabile) presents a picture, evidently a reverie in which the composer meditates upon the ancient state and grandeur of the country. In the finale, the romantic sentiment disappears and we have the heroic expressed with astonishing force and exuberant spirit in its three themes, which finally give place to a short second part, maestoso, colored by national melody, and closing this exquisite picture of the Scotch visit.

Art of Accompanying.

G. Schlerner has just published a book by Algernon H. Lindo, on "The Art of Accompanying." The author's valuable advice is based upon an experience of more than twenty years of accompanying at every kind of concert and for every grade of artist. The author moreover enjoyed the acquaintance of nearly every well known English accompanist and has carefully studied their methods, as well as the methods of many famous Continental accompanists. The musician will find hints as to reading at sight, technique and repertoire, transposing, alterations in accompaniments, airs from operas, foreign songs, violin and violoncello solos, and the special requirements for accompanying them, orchestral accompanying, etc.

Well-Known Musical Directors.

Hugo Riesenfeld, Rialto Theater, New York City.

OWING partly to the position he holds as conductor of the orchestra at The Rialto, and partly to the rare spirit and intelligence he displays in his work, Hugo Riesenfeld is perhaps the most popular musical director in New York today. Certainly he is known to a larger number of people than anyone else holding a like position. Four times a day, week in and week out, he steps into the pit, welcomed always by a friendly round of applause, and leads his men through a variety of selections which ranges from the most complicated symphonies to the lightest of musical comedy hits. Always earnest, always alert, and always magnetic, he holds his forty musicians to the finest shading of tempo and volume with a nicety which marks the truly gifted artist.

In Mr. Rothapel, who selects each musical number played at The Rialto, and Dr. Riesenfeld, who arranges the selections and interprets them for the public, the institution has a working combination difficult to excel. Mr. Rothapel has a natural intuition for the emotional significance of various kinds of music. Dr. Riesenfeld is the thoroughly schooled musician who can make the emotional quality of a selection apparent to those who hear it. Working together, the two produce harmonious results, which are a natural reflection of the harmonious personal relations existing between them. Each understands the other's temperament, each respects the other's distinctive abilities, and though they disagree occasionally upon the respective values of certain compositions, such an enduring friendship has sprung up between them that all disputes, no matter how heated, inevitably end in the linking of arms and an exit in search of a place where all arguments may be drowned in a convivial cup of coffee.

Much of Dr. Riesenfeld's marked success in the field where he is one of the pioneers is due to his pride in his position and his sincere belief in the genuine educational work which the Rialto Orchestra is accomplishing.

"To be the bridge which connects those incompetent to judge good music with those who appreciate the high standards of the Metropolitan Opera—that is the mission of an orchestra such as we have here," he explains, "I feel quite safe in saying, and I say in all sincerity, that because of the thousands of persons whom it reaches every day of the week, this orchestra is more directly responsible for awakening a widespread demand for good, well executed music than any symphony orchestra now in existence."

This explains why a man of Riesenfeld's musicianship, a man who has held the baton over the orchestra in the Imperial Opera House at Vienna, not only consented to devote his talent to the music of an institution dedicated primarily to the screen drama, but has entered wholeheartedly into the work with the firm belief that his organization has a definite, laudable mission to perform. His interest in the musical program is by no means confined to the overtures, the soloists, and the various concerted numbers which make it up. He is just as sincere in his musical interpretation of what is transpiring on the screen. It was this musical interpretation of the pictures which put Mr. Rothapel in the position he now occupies, and in Dr. Riesenfeld Mr. Rothapel has an able exponent of his theories along that line.

"The dramas portrayed on the screen, the wondrous views of Nature, the gripping interest of history-making events—all these have their distinct emotional appeal," he says. "It is there to be seized upon by the true musician and translated by him in a way that will move his auditors. By adding the sense of hearing to the sense of sight, the psychological appeal of the film is just doubled and if the selections used be of the better sort—the truly interpretative sort—the film becomes one of the greatest educators the world of music has ever known."

Dr. Riesenfeld was born in Vienna. He graduated as violinist from the Vienna Conservatory and after leaving that celebrated institution he became a concert violinist. He has had the distinction of playing before the German Emperor. When Gustave Mahler, director of the Vienna Opera House, heard him play he engaged him at once, and it was at the Imperial Opera House that Dr. Riesenfeld conducted the ballet and produced the first ballet that he composed himself. It was called "Chopin's Dance," and met with enthusiastic approval.

Oscar Hammerstein brought Riesenfeld over to New York and for four years he was engaged at the Grand Opera House as concert master and conductor. Later Klaw & Erlanger engaged him as conductor and produced a comic opera which he composed. Mr. Rothapel, hearing him interpret a Strauss waltz, engaged him as conductor for The Rialto, where he has had charge of the orchestra ever since the institution opened.

The Art of Registration.

An organist seated before the keyboard to some extent resembles the artist who holds the palette in his left hand. Here are many colors to choose from. Which combinations will produce the desired effect? There are the diapason, string, wood and reed families. What can surpass the fine, rich, honest sonorosity of the diapason stops when united for full effects? And then, the strings, with their characteristic color. These combined on the different manuals seem so pure and yet so penetrating. The mellow wood or flute stop—how different they are from the metal stops! Finally the characteristic reeds with their ear-arresting quality. What beautiful sounds lie here.

In the hands of a discriminating, ignorant, or tasteless player, these rich resources may be rendered hideous and repelling. Careful study and close observation may cause the organist to make combinations which are safe and sane, and therefore not offensive to good taste.

But the feeling for "color"—as is the case in the art of painting—is born, not made. An organist can sit before a thirty stop, three manual instrument, hours a day for years, without exhausting its possible combinations. Of course, many of these would be inartistic or disagreeable, but it would rest with him to learn what to unite.

The organ has frequently been compared to an orchestra, but the comparison is not just to either side. While many names of organ stops are taken from orchestral instruments, yet the similarity, in a number of instances, ends with the name. It is, of course, radically impossible to obtain a true string effect by means of a column of air passing through a metal tube, yet the names of the entire family of stringed instruments (including a number now obsolete) are freely used by organ builders in their nomenclature of stops. Then, in regard to what is generally termed "tone color," an effect with an oboe, a clarinet, or a horn may be desired by the orchestral composer. He writes in such a manner that the special instrument called for is emphasized, but in only one note at a time. But the organist who has his oboe stop out can only make a single note prominent by playing it on a separate manual from that containing the other parts. The stop affects all other keys on the same manual. With the orchestra a variety of kaleidoscopic color effects may continually go on by means of instruments being added or dropped, but the organist cannot do this continually without injuring the flow of the music; so he must depend more upon a set of registration.

He is therefore necessarily more limited in obtaining variety of color than is the orchestral conductor, and sometimes must employ stops which he would prefer to omit. Indeed, an organist is apt to have his judgment calloused by the difficulty in obtaining a variety of registration, and thus become accustomed to retaining one or more stops when he feels that they should be discontinued. The reeds are liable to suffer in this respect. Their effectiveness is frequently abused by those who consider that they should employ them at every opportunity.

The present writer here takes advantage of his position and experience to give a few points of advice on registration to those who might have occasion to profit by them:

Be sparing of reeds; use the tremolo very seldom, and then only for special effect; do not use any 16-foot stops for ordinary playing—it makes the tone sound "thick"; be careful of the use of the 2 and 4-foot stops; some may say that the organ sounds like "a box of whistles"; good, 8-foot tone besprinkled with 4-foot is what is reliable; combine diapasons, strings and wood with discrimination; avoid bizarre effects, and especially loud playing. A few salient features in his work such as these as a basis, with occasional legitimate departures, may give an organist a reputation as being skillful and tasteful in registration.

Worth While Songs.

Five songs which will certainly find a conspicuous place in concert hall and theater very promptly are "I Am Thy Harp," "A Little Friendship Song," "A Weesome Little Baby," "Requiem" and "I Love You, Dear," compositions by Halle Cooke Caldwell, which are from the press of Luchardt and Eider of New York. These songs are far above the average. The musical conception is original and fine, the accompaniments ideal for the piano, and the flow of melody is in strictest harmony with the charm of the beautiful poems. The collection is altogether worthy of immediate and serious attention.

Improvising (Part II).

THESE articles are addressed particularly to those whose experience or whose location, or perhaps both, has prevented their hearing much improvising upon given themes, particularly in its relation to accompanying moving pictures. There is no question as to the advisability of choosing standard works for the accompanying of pictures, and there is likewise no question that as a rule these works will be played as written by the composer. Of course, one does not invariably play all the movements in a composition just as they are printed. Often one part will clash with the sentiment of the picture, and the conscientious performer will leave out that part. Sometimes he will want to use but a single part or strain. If he is playing to his pictures he will have no hesitation in choosing any part of a composer's work which seems to fit, or of leaving out any part which does not seem to fit. A great deal has been said in the past about playing a piece in its entirety "because the composer wrote it that way, and he knew how he wanted it played." Any one who is fortunate enough to hear some of the orchestral accompaniments selected for the more pretentious pictures will hear excerpts from the works of the best composers—whole movements, parts of movements, strains and phrases, anything which describes the sentiment of the picture, and played only so long as it does describe that sentiment. One doesn't always like chopping a phrase off abruptly to switch to another. Generally this jars on the hearer's sensibilities and draws his attention from the picture to the music—something you do not want to do. In changing from one movement to another which is in strong contrast to it—either a contrasting key or contrasting movement—or both—one will usually stop on a note which can be used as a "pivot" to swing easily into the next movement.

(A.) etc.

(B.)

As an illustration, let us look at an old friend—the "Dridal Chorus" from Lohengrin. While we are playing it the scene changes, and we want to change with it—say to another old friend—the waltz (ballad) from "Faust."

(I am using illustrations which I am sure everybody is familiar with.) In the first example shown (Ex. 12) we will suppose the change occurs about the twenty-fifth measure after the chorus proper begins. I have chosen that particular spot and used the note "A" as a pivot to swing into the next movement. In each of the examples here given

EX. 14.

I changed directly to the new movement (a waltz) using the pivot note ("A") to mark the new tempo as well as to act as a pivot for the modulating chords which lead us into the new key. This modulation can be used just as it stands in any one of the measures from the 25th to the 32d. Suppose we wish to change a little earlier in the number. Ex. 13 shows the 17th and 8th measures after the chorus proper begins. Here we find ourselves stopping upon the chord of C minor. We will use the "G" as a pivot. You will notice in each example that although we are modulating to the key of D, we are not trying to bring into prominence the chord of D. We are introducing instead the dominant 7th of the key of D. (This chord—the dominant 7th—consists of the notes: A, C sharp, E and G.) Now, the first illustration in Ex. 13 starts with the note "G" as a pivot. This is the 7th of "A" (the dominant of D), and although an "A" is added in the 3d measure of the modulating phrase, "G" is still the pivot.

In the second illustration of Ex. 13 we make our change still further along in the number. We now change from the chord of B flat. I have chosen to use both B flat and D as pivotal notes, progressing through the chord of the augmented sixth to the dominant chord of the key of D natural. (A, C sharp and E natural.)

than the chord of the key. In this case, we aimed for the chord of "A" (the dominant of the key of "D") instead of the chord of "D," although "D" is the key to which we are modulating. I do not mean to say that you must invariably aim for the dominant chord, nor that that is the only way to modulate. I only mean to say that it is a sure way—always bound to be satisfactory and not apt to grow tiresome nor monotonous. Leading to the dominant, or more preferably the dominant 7th and resolving from that to the new key is always satisfactory to the ear.

The modulations given in Ex. 12 and in the two illustrations in Ex. 13 are four measures in length. One doesn't like to make it much, if any shorter, as an abrupt change of key is sometimes startling rather than pleasing. However, it is sometimes necessary to change abruptly from one key to another—often to greatly contrasting keys. Changes to relative keys are easy and agreeable to the ear, but a quick change to a key a half tone or a whole tone higher, or a half tone or whole tone lower is not always to manage. Of course nobody wants to make these startling modulations if he can help it, but it comes in pretty handy sometimes to know the shortest way of getting to such keys.

Examples 14 and 15 illustrate a means of changing from one key to a key a half tone higher. This is done through one modulating chord only. Other tables will be introduced later illustrating methods of abrupt modulations by means of one or two modulating chords.

Individuality in Playing for Moving Pictures.

By Norman Stuckey.

MUSICIANS in moving picture theaters who are successful interpreting the varied action on the screen with appropriate and pleasing music should be artists of exceptional individuality. Individuality is nothing more or less than originality. There are few fields of human endeavor that require more creative effort than the musical field where the high-class musical settings for films is made a feature.

The musician, whether pianist, organist or orchestra leader, who lacks originality and individuality, is not an sure of success as his rival who possesses these essential qualities. There are thousands of musicians in picture theaters today who are making little advancement over their style of playing of a year ago, and this is a fact to be lamented, considering the progress it is possible to make in music.

Progress is the secret of success in any business, and this is especially true of music. The musician who is satisfied that he knows all there is to know about music is a detriment to himself, his manager and the public.

The ambitious and successful musician is wide-awake to conditions. He has an antipathy for the shirker. Always ready to improve his technique so that the rendition of new music is artistic, the progressive musician also should read the happenings in the musical world and always be eager to learn the new music appropriate for film interpretation that is constantly being published.

I once knew a violinist who was undoubtedly 50 per cent. better than the average theater musician. There were few numbers that he could not play in a clean, artistic style. His technique was exceptional and his foundation training the best. While the other members of the orchestra were spending their time playing pinocchio, this violinist would go to an unoccupied dressing room in a secluded part of the theater, where he would practice.

When a difficult piece of music was placed on his stand, he had the advantage over the other musicians. This violinist knew that his fingers were in condition to execute difficult passages and this alone gave him the confidence to attack and play the piece as it should be played. While the cornet player or cellist stumbled over their parts, they regretted the fact, but the damage had been done, and the effect of the music spoiled.

It is indeed surprising what a half-hour's practice a day will do for the musician who wishes to improve his playing and to impart individuality to his work. Your playing should reflect your disposition. If you come to the theater with a grouch, your playing is bound to show it. You are liable to take your feelings out on the music, and usually the result is not pleasant to the audience.

The pianist who has been away from the piano any length of time knows that his fingers are not responsive and that the rendition of scales and arpeggios is an effort. It is a known fact that a little practice each day makes the musician's work lighter. The fingers respond easier and there is not the mental worry and physical effort when the musician knows that he is "in condition."

Many musicians fail to make their playing individual because of their carelessness. Many pianists, especially beginners, fail to observe expression marks. They seldom observe the tempo in which a piece should be played, and they also often fail to notice whether it is marked loud (f) or soft (p). When they come to a sign that is unfamiliar, they guess at its meaning instead of looking it up in a musical dictionary at the first opportunity. Every musician should have a small musical dictionary handy where he can consult it when musical terms puzzle. This will materially aid him in playing a number correctly, and greatly enlarge his musical vocabulary.

The choice of interesting and tuneful music is also highly important. When the musician finds little interest in his work, he becomes mechanical and the result—his playing is cold and without feeling.

Orchestra leaders should always vary their program with a variety of tuneful and interesting numbers. They should also use care and discretion and not play any number too often or more than once, or at the most, twice through. There are many numbers, themes, etc., that will bear repeating, but the majority of numbers are more effective when played once or twice.

Many musicians who have had vaudeville experience know the labor and effort concerned when an act uses a waltz or a march for fifteen minutes. When selecting music for the film, do not use music that soon becomes monotonous or tiresome to the musicians to play. Usually, the best selections and standard numbers never become tiresome,

Individuality in playing for moving pictures is an art; and the successful composer, as everyone knows, is he who is entirely original in his compositions. The musician who interprets the compositions must also be original. He must grasp the composer's ideas at once and play the number exactly as the composer would play it himself. Many musicians play a piece in a sing-song manner, regardless of the tempo or phrasing. Certain liberties may be taken with many compositions, as it is sometimes necessary in order to fit the action on the screen, but the musician must use his best judgment instead of playing the piece so that it is not easily recognized by anyone in the audience who happens to know the composition.

The musician who is dissatisfied with his playing and wishes to improve his style, can, to a certain extent, cultivate style and originality that will make him a leader in the profession.

First, he must be serious. Many theater musicians regard their work in the theater as the hardest kind of manual labor. If they would look upon it as pleasure, better results would be forthcoming. Study and an intelligent understanding can make your work a pleasure. Many refer to their work as a "grind." Musicians who do this are not liable to advance.

It is impossible to succeed in your work if you do not like it. You must resolve to master the details of the position that will make it pleasant, and this can be accomplished by becoming proficient. The musician who dreads playing certain numbers, because of their technical difficulties, will always find his work unpleasant, for he is always in fear of having to play a number that is technically beyond him.

This musician should take immediate steps to overcome the little obstacles that make his work unpleasant, and this can be done only by serious and conscientious practice. In becoming proficient you become efficient, and this today is a paying asset, for there is no demand for the careless and inefficient musician.

The efficient musician is seldom out of work. His services are always in demand—as are the services of efficient men in every line of business. The efficient musician never has to worry about his position. He never has to worry about another musician succeeding him, because he knows that his work is of the highest standard which invariably brings its own rewards.

Music Every Musician Should Know.

"La Prophete" Coronation March—Meyerbeer.

Meyerbeer's opera is based upon the Anabaptist fanaticism of the sixteenth century, which agitated a large part of Germany and Holland. The leader was Bockelson, the "prophet," commonly called John of Leyden, son of an innkeeper.

The "Coronation March" occurs in the Cathedral of Munster, where the "prophet" is about to be crowned after the rebels under his leadership have captured the city. The royal cortege gradually assembles to the stirring strains of the march, much as the Landgrave's court assembles to the imposing march in Wagner's "Tannhauser," on the occasion when the minstrel knights are to be heard in the song tournament.

Meyerbeer placed a company of trumpeters and players of other brass instruments on the stage (in the cathedral) so that they and the orchestra proper talk back and forth to each other, as it were.

The march begins with the majestic passage from the full orchestra. Then the trumpets and saxhorns in the cathedral blare forth a mighty fanfare, answered immediately from the orchestra. This dialogue, as we might term it, proceeds for several measures.

After this, introduced by a solo-measure on the kettle drums, begins the beautiful lyric passage, sung by the clarinets, violins, cellos and bassoon, the accompaniment being for strings, and the French horns.

These episodes are repeated until, toward the finale, the brass band on the stage and the orchestra in the pit have another "argument," each one this time having a longer sentence to pronounce. Finally they become inextricably mixed up, every one shouting at once. Then the "Coronation March" closed in a tremendous climax in perfect harmony, all differences of opinion having been adjusted.

Too often the "Coronation March" is played too fast. The time or tempo should be slow enough to make it truly majestic.

By Clarence E. Sinn.

IN OUR last article (April 21, page 426) something was said about modulating. Now, while this is a study apart from composition or improvisation, it will be found convenient by the picture-music improviser to memorize the examples we are here offering as a short and agreeable means of quickly progressing from any key to a remote key. Keys lying a half tone above or below are remote in that we cannot progress (or change) to them without one or more intervening chords which lead up to and connect the new key with the old. Keys a fifth above C. And so we say the chord consists of a "fundamental, its third and its fifth."

Look at Example 18. The first illustration (a) shows a chord of C. Being built on the note C, this note is the foundation or "fundamental." It is also called the "tonic," and the chord is known as "the tonic chord." (In the key of D the tonic chord is the chord of D; in the key of F the tonic chord is F, and so on.)

In the first chord shown in Example 18 (a) we find C (the tonic), E (the third), and G (the fifth).

This, as said before, constitutes the tonic chord, key of C. In the next measure (b) we find two other chords. These are also built with a fundamental, a third and a fifth. The fundamental note of the second chord is four notes above the tonic. This chord is called the "subdominant." The fundamental of the next chord is five notes above the tonic. The chord is called the "dominant chord." The dominant chord is always built on a note five notes above the tonic (or four notes below; it is the same thing). Adding an F to the chord shown (F is a seventh above G) makes the chord a "dominant seventh." Look at Example 19.

Ex. 19.

The second measure shows the same tonic chord in another position. The third measure (after the double bar) shows the dominant chord of the key of C (G, B and D). The following measure shows the same chord with a note added above. This note is F and is a seventh above G. The chord is therefore called a "dominant seventh." (In Example 19 the added note—the seventh—is indicated by an x.) The dominant seventh resolves naturally to its tonic chord. When you hear this chord you expect the tonic chord to follow it. For this reason I have chosen to make these illustrations of abrupt modulations made through the dominant seventh chord. As said before, it is safe and sure.

It will not be a bad idea for readers unfamiliar with chords and chord building to write the tonic chords in all keys, then—counting upward five notes, beginning with the tonic—find the dominant and write its chord; the seventh can then be added, giving you the dominant seventh chord. One should be familiar with these two chords, at least, in every key. The performer should be able to tell instantly what is the tonic chord of the key he may happen to be playing in, and also its dominant seventh.

a whole tone above (or below) are also remote in the same sense. Examples 14 and 15 (page 426, April 21) show a means of progressing from any key to the one a half tone above it by only one modulating chord. We first move to the dominant seventh of the new key we have in mind; the rest takes care of itself.

Moving upward a whole tone, we aim for the dominant seventh chord of the key to which we wish to change. See Examples 16 and 17.

From the key of C to that of D is a whole tone. Wishing to modulate immediately from the lower to the higher key, you first think of the dominant seventh of that key.

The dominant chord of D-major (or minor) is the chord of A-major, and is composed of the notes A, C-sharp and E. Adding the note G (which is seven notes above A) we get the chord of the dominant seventh of D. The chord of C already contains two of these notes, viz.: E and G. All we need alter is to raise our key note (C) to

C-sharp, and to add our bass note (A). See first measure in Example 16.

Readers who have not studied harmony would do well to familiarize themselves with the names of the commoner chords and why they are so named. And this will, of course, include something of chord building. Although I gave a few explanatory illustrations of this in my first set of articles last year, I am going to risk repetition. Maybe there are some who don't know but would like to.

A chord in its simple form consists of three notes, viz.: A "fundamental," from which the chord takes its name (this is often called the "tonic"); a note two degrees higher than the fundamental, and another note two degrees higher than the last. For example, the chord of C consists of the fundamental note C, the note E and the note G. But we do not say any note in a chord is "so many degrees higher." We always count the lower note as 1 and reckon upward. Thus, the note

Herbert Spencer on Music.

Herbert Spencer, one of England's greatest men and one of the greatest philosophers the world has known, wrote much about music and wrote intelligently about it as well. This is what he has to say to those who take no interest in music. It is to be found in "The Study of Sociology," Chapter VI:

"You have, perhaps, in the course of your life, had some musical culture; and can recall the stages through which you have passed. In the early days a symphony was a mystery; and you were somewhat puzzled to find others applauding it. An unfolding of musical faculty that went on slowly through the succeeding years brought some appreciation; and now these complex musical combinations which once gave you little or no pleasure give you more pleasure than any others. Remembering all this, you suspect your indifference to certain still more involved musical combinations may arise from incapacity in you and not from faults in them. See, on the other hand, what happens when one who has undergone no such series of changes—say, an old naval officer, whose life at sea kept him out of the way of concerts and operas. You hear him occasionally confess, or rather boast, how much he enjoys bagpipes. While the last cadence of a sonata which a young lady has just played are still in your ears he goes up to her and asks whether she can play 'Polly, Put the Kettle On,' or 'Johnny Comes Marching Home,' and then, when concerts are talked about at the table, he seizes the occasion for expressing his dislike of classical music, and scarcely conceals his contempt for those who go to hear it. On contemplating his mental state, you see that along with the absence of the ability to grasp complex musical combinations, there goes no consciousness of the absence—that there is no suspicion that such complex combinations exist, and that other persons have faculties for appreciating them."

In "Facts and Comments," Herbert Spencer's last work, published less than two years before his death, are to be found many references to music. There are forty short essays in the book, and the names of five of them are: "The Corruption of Music," "The Origin of Music," "Developed Music," "Meyerbeer," "Some Musical Heresies."

The essay called "The Purpose of Art" has more to do with music than with any other art. In that essay he says:

"Musical critics often give applause to compositions as being scientific—as being meritorious not in respect to the emotions they arouse but as appealing to the cultured intelligence of the musician. I hold these to be perverted beliefs having their roots in the prevailing enormous error respecting the constitution of mind. * * * When we come to the alleged higher meaning of music—to that instruction which a composer is assumed to utter and the listener to comprehend—we have yet a further interference with the true end."

In "The Corruption of Music" we find:

"Three-fourths of musical audiences at the present day appreciate but little the musical ideas and feelings of the composer, or the effective rendering of them; but the extraordinary feat of vocalization, or a display of marvelous gymnastics on the violin, bring a round of applause. * * *

In this way performers, desiring less to render faithfully the meanings of the composers than to exhibit their powers of execution, vitiate the music and the tastes of their hearers. * * * The mischief originates in the performer's preoccupation with self, for this largely excludes occupation with the composer's thought. The dominant feeling is not love of the music rendered, but the desire for applause which brilliant rendering will bring. Nor is this all. There is a more widely diffused and less obtrusive mischief. A dominant trait of musical execution is rapidity. A sarabande or a tarantelle is easy enough, provided it be played slowly. The skill is shown in playing it with great speed; and teachers incite their pupils to achieve this great speed. The result is gradually to raise the standard of time, and the conception of what is the appropriate time is everywhere being changed in the direction of acceleration. This affects not pieces of display only but pieces of genuine music."

From "Some Musical Heresies":

"Among future changes some old forms of orchestral music may possibly lose their pre-eminence. It is said that the symphony was originally a suite de pieces—the pieces being dance music. Hence, considered as a work of art, the symphony has no natural coherence. Further, it seems that since in the choice of pieces to form the suite, the aim must have been variety, the successive pieces were selected not for their kinship, but for their absence of kinship. Of course, a like remark applies to the sonata, in which, also, the absence of kinship is conspicuous; instance in Beethoven's op. 26, in which the funeral march stands in such strong contrast alike with the scherzo which precedes it, and with the allegro, which succeeds it. * * * True artistic changes should be such as minister to natural changes of feeling, either emotional or sensational, such as might naturally arise from changes of mood. Arbitrary ones, however skillfully managed, negative that manifest coherence which a work of art should have."

The Study of Composition.

Musical composition is the art of building musical phrases—portions of melody—into periods of greater extent than is natural. The laws governing the structure of a symmetrical melody, or tune, are so simple that they may be acquired almost intuitively; but to construct music of greater scope than this requires conscious labor and considerable technical knowledge.

Composition is as much a constructive art as joinery or architecture and must therefore be practiced consciously until long use of experience enables us to exercise our painfully acquired powers subconsciously. Yet nearly every one begins with the vague idea that he has only to turn his eyes up to heaven, like a prophet in a picture to be delivered of a musical work complete in all its parts. I would advise a perusal, of Edgar Allan Poe's fine essay on "The Philosophy of Composition," as the most effectual antidote to this perilous delusion. It is only possible to dispense with the searchlight of ratiocination, and it is very doubtful whether the expert gains anything by so doing. But it is in the nature of the person of feeling to want to do everything by unbridled impulse, as it is in the nature of the intellectual person to love, to fill up a form. The real artist—a combination of two—reasons out his work first; then, having fashioned it in the rough, he rewrites and rewrites until the bare bones are quite hidden. I am aware that in order that the musician, in order to understand composition, must first be taught to recognize time and irregular patterns of notes in time which we call rhythm; secondly to appreciate the relative pitch of notes (not necessarily the absolute pitch); thirdly to analyze combined sounds; fourthly to retain the memory of music just heard while listening to fresh sounds and anticipating coming ones. That such powers are possible to the ordinary ear without special gifts I affirm most emphatically, and can produce ample evidence of the fact.—Frederick Cordeur.

Better Results in Piano Playing.

A beautiful sonorous tone is not acquired without difficulty. Persons generally say, "On the piano the sound is already made." This is absolutely wrong. Every virtuoso has a tone quality peculiar to himself. In addition to the study which he has made of tone, of his intelligence, of his artistic temperament we must take into consideration the conformation of the hand, its fleshy or bony character, its lightness or heaviness. The tone is not ready-made; it depends upon the instrument, and the artist's qualities, both natural and acquired.

Suppleness, independence, elasticity of the hand and of the wrist contribute powerfully to vary the sonorosity, the quality of tone. We do not strike the key, we attack it very close, sink down upon it, press with force and energy in forte; in piano it is as if we knead the keys with a boneless hand and velvet fingers.

History of Music.

In his great book, "Educational Problems," G. Stanley Hall says, of musical education with regard to the history of music:

"All should center about actual music, and the standard productions of great masters should be incessantly repeated and the story of their lives known. Such illustrations are now practical in these days of mechanical players.

"This historic course should not only be broad and thorough, but the point of departure for every other department.

"Growth responds to growth and genius provokes response and appeals profoundly to the faculties of youth, for progress is inspiration to the young.

"Every great composer of the past should have his week or month of daily work, and every great era its full term of exclusive study. Everything should be practical, with a rich historic perspective."

Mr. Theodore Bendix on Ragtime.

Theodore Bendix for thirty years has been a New York musician. Mr. Bendix has a number of string quartets in the theaters. He is a lover of the best and points out a significant thing. "We give a varied program always, but the applause is always for the good things. There is seldom any applause for cheap music. If we play something from the operas, the applause is certain."

Mr. Bendix thinks this is a sign of the times and that it will only be a matter of a short time when ragtime will no longer have the hold it now has.

Memorizing Music.

In the art of music, the subject of memory is of vital importance. Whether as a mere accomplishment, or for professional purposes, the study of music is facilitated in the acquisition of material and in performance, by a good memory.

The command of a large repertoire gained at the least possible expense of time is a matter of no small amount. The demands on modern virtuosity are not greater than those on the memory. To hold one's own with others a strong memory is at present imperative.

The musician, whether pianist, organist or orchestra conductor, can hope to do little towards the successful rendition of film accompaniment unless he has a good memory and is continually developing the memorizing of music suitable for film interpretation. True, a card system or a catalog is of inestimable value, but to a great extent, the successful theater musician must depend largely upon his memory.

Starting with the proposition that memory, like other faculties, is not a fixed quantity, it seeks to develop its practically limitless capacity by natural means which embody the general law of growth. This system shows that small tasks regularly applied strengthen the faculty or function and prepare it for progressively larger ones.

No student of music would dream of mastering a difficult composition by commencing with it as his first lesson, even were he sustained by the hoorest intention of wrestling with its difficulties as long as he would have done had he begun at the usual preliminary stage and worked his way up to it in the accredited way of graded lessons.

But this is, in reality, what is commonly done in memorizing music; and because the average memory falls in the tasks assigned it, it is blamed. A poor memory—but what remedy is suggested to improve it? The mastery of a long composition, which, even when it is committed to memory by the severest struggles, is forgotten again almost as soon as learned.

A wholly different discipline is necessary to accomplish the end in view. It is, broadly speaking, the memorizing of short tasks, and, when possible, pleasant ones, and constantly systematically reviewing them from memory. This, however, must not be carried to extremes, as strength is only gained by a series of efforts, each one a little greater than the preceding. The demands of perfect reviewing will fairly test the desirable length and difficulty of the tasks to improve it. In nearly every piece of music passages can be found that are practically complete in themselves, similar to quotations that are singled out from the works of the great authors.

These often contain the gist of long parts and whole movements. The "themes" of variations form excellent material, as also the variations themselves, if otherwise suitable, as they offer sufficient diversity and yet have organic likeness. Little preludes and transcriptions of beautiful songs can be used to advantage. Tables of modulations are exceedingly interesting and valuable in many ways. The importance of being perfectly familiar with the various forms of musical composition makes it advisable to select passages from each, as representative of their individual characteristics. The gavotte and minuet differ as widely as a waltz and polka. Their distinctive features could be driven into the mind most effectually by the continual repetition of their salient passages.

Some musical experiments will disclose similar facts. The simplest melody will require more time to memorize when performed on an instrument with which the musician is familiar only to a slight extent. A passage similarly attempted in an unusual key will also consume comparatively more time. The same piece played on an instrument which offers no special technical difficulty, is committed to memory with the least labor.

The visualizing process is important and musicians in whom this visualizing power is strong can utilize it greatly. Even if the faculty be not sufficiently developed to retain a whole composition, yet it may be made very serviceable in localizing certain critical passages, and those which would suggest long parts between them. Often a given motive will at different places be slightly modified or lead to a different development. These passages thus localized will greatly aid in mastering their context. Indeed the pictorial appearance of musical notation, whatever be its other glaring defects, lends itself happily to the exercise of the visualizing faculty. Clear paper, good type, tasteful arrangement, all impress the eye and mind pleasantly. Accent marks, rallentandos, diminuendos, ties, staccato points, etc., can well be visualized, and help also in locating many passages which would be likely to elude the efforts of memory.

Productive or Non-Productive?

By Caroline H. Hibbard.

The various factors which constitute any business organization come under one or the other of two general classifications: Productive and Non-Productive (or Overhead Expense).

In the motion picture business there is a factor, which, contrary to custom, is not predestined in its classification. It is entirely up to the exhibitor whether this part of his organization belongs in the first or second mentioned class.

This factor is music. Every exhibitor in the country knows that music is an indispensable part of motion picture entertainment, whether in a magnificent "Strand" or humble 400 or 500 seating capacity house; but this little discussion is not specifically concerned with either of these extremes; it deals more particularly with the problem of the vast number of exhibitors operating 10 to 25 cent admission houses.

A large proportion of those exhibitors give multiple reel or feature film performances. It is safe to say that all of them have music and a majority maintain an orchestra. An orchestra, however small, runs into money—money for the musicians, and money for the music. And the actual cost of the music is no small item—on an average $25 or $30 worth is required to accompany a five reel performance—and this does not include comedies or weeklies.

Here some exhibitor says: "But I don't buy the music—my leader provides that." Yes, Mr. Exhibitor; your leader very likely does provide the music; all the same you pay for it in the end because the leader who owns a comprehensive library commands a greater salary than the leader who is not so equipped.

So in any event, the exhibitor pays not only for musicians, but for the music itself. Now then, how can this apparently non-productive factor be converted into a productive element?

This is where the exhibitor must think the matter over from the inside out. Nearly every other phase of the motion picture proposition has been studied with microscopic care, but as a rule the music question has been disposed of with the conclusion that it is a customary part of the program which the exhibitor must reckon on the same as he does rent and other unavoidable expense.

It is safe to say that the average exhibitor, progressive in other directions, does not realize that "playing" pictures is not only a new art, but a very peculiar one. It bears no relation to concert playing because the music must always be subservient—yet its importance is significant. A successful exhibitor—like a successful manager—must be a "forward psychologist." He must sense immediately whether the emotions registered on the screen evoke kindred emotions or sympathetic appreciation on the part of the audience. He is frequently at a loss to understand why some certain feature film is not equally successful at different theaters. In one house the audience is spell-bound, following the action through the quickly changing scenes with eager interest and undivided attention, while in another theater, where the same film is being shown, there is an apathetic atmosphere. The picture itself is the same, and motion picture audiences are of so democratic a compound that what pleases one (in the first class houses here considered) logically may be expected to please another. What, then, is the subtle something which differentiates the performances?

The answer is "Music." In the first instance, the music serves as an interpreter of emotion and mood; the substitute for the well-chosen word or phrase that illuminates literature. It helps the audience to think with the picture—to follow not only a succession of interesting actions, but to sense the underlying motives and mental processes. The audience thus gets all there is in the picture. That same audience that particular theater to a friend—and so the circle of its popularity and prosperity widens. Every factor that contributes to the box office in this manner belongs to the productive class.

In the second instance, under analysis the music is found to be meaningless. This does not imply that it necessarily is poor music or poorly rendered music. Simply, it bears no relation to the scenes thrown on the screen. The impressions received through the eye and ear do not coincide. The audience does not fully "get across."

Because the music does not fit the picture comes under the non-productive ban. The motion picture exhibitor cannot eliminate music from his program; but if he has no reason to think that it helps swell his box-office receipts, he naturally jots the cost down as so much overhead expense.

The wise business man strives to turn every expenditure into a paying investment. Is your music, Mr. Exhibitor, in the Productive or Non-Productive Class?

MUSIC AND THE PICTURES.

THE general public is very apt to think that little skill or gray matter is required of a moving picture organist or director. How often are we conscious-as we sit before the screen that little of either is exercised as we see a most remarkable piece of acting utterly ruined by inappropriate music. If a little time and thought were but given to the picture about to be presented, music which suggests atmosphere and action may lift a big picture to greater heights and intensify a commonplace picture to a point were it may be most acceptable. 'Tis true people usually do not go to moving picture theaters to listen to the music. They go to see pictures properly presented.

On one occasion the writer remembers seeing two well-known terpsichorean artists on the screen, dancing the steps of a dainty minuet when from the orchestra pit came the strains of "Just a Wearyin' for You." In itself a very pleasing melody, but used in connection with such a picture made the work of both artists appear most ordinary. At yet another time the scene centered about a death bed, and all through it the overture continued fortissimo, the drummer in particular doing his share at what seemed to us an attempt to wake the dead. These episodes occurred in prominent theaters of our country and are but two examples of the utter indifference some directors maintain toward the screen.

In order to properly present pictures the atmosphere of the picture should never be sacrificed to the music. The audience should be but subsequently aware of its presence, preferring the music to be subdued and in perfect harmony with the theme, rather than allowing it to dominate. An appropriate musical setting is to the photoplay what a beautiful frame is to an artistic painting. The music is the "frame" to the picture, and if inappropriate music is used it detracts violently.

Undoubtedly the moving picture has opened up new worlds to the modern musician, yet, so far as I am aware, but two of our composers, namely Victor Herbert and Leoncavallo, have turned their attention to the writing of music for the films. The composer of today displays anything but an attitude of respect toward this new field, yet I believe the time is approaching when we shall learn that not one or two, but many of our foremost composers have contributed to this art.

The possibility of elevating the taste of thousands who do not now appreciate the classics, may play a very important part in the life of an organist or musical director. The audience will listen with attention to music it would not tolerate if played in solo form, owing to the fact it is following the development of a drama on the screen. As Mr. Marum says, "Ethically a good picture cannot fail to leave its impress on an intelligent audience, and in the same degree good music increases artistic appreciation."

Certainly the music usually is on a level with the type of entertainment offered. Arrangers are constantly using old melodies for entirely different purposes than those for which they were meant. Has it ever occurred to us that the moving picture demands an absolutely new kind of music?

That is why I say there is a field and a big field for the young composer to tackle. It will not be long before an enterprising director engages an enterprising musician to compose music for the cinema drama. Only a short time ago the Strand theater of this city offered a cash prize for the best descriptive composition to be used in connection with the films, with the additional inducement of permitting the winner to direct the score at a public performance. This, I understand, brought forth but few compositions of any real merit, which goes to show that the young musician feels that he is prostituting his art should he lower himself enough to compose for the films. Indeed, I should not be surprised to learn that Richard Strauss was under contract to compose an accompaniment to a screened drama. Undoubtedly it would be hard to imagine the pianist of a small town theater playing such a score with but two hands, for such scores would no doubt require more combinations of sounds than the modern Wurlitzer could produce.

The single man orchestra, if the man be of an inventive turn of mind or is the possessor of a good memory, may improvise his score as the picture unreefs before his astonished vision, varying it each show according to his whims until it reaches a satisfactory point which is his idea of perfection. Such directors are comparatively rare who, improvising as it were, would be able to rise to the occasion of each individual scene.

A general knowledge of the best piano and vocal compositions, together with a repertoire of organ classics and the better orchestra scores combined with a careful preparation of a picture striving not only to "fit" the picture with good music but also to use appropriate combinations of organ stops, will soon develop an exceedingly good player. In succeeding articles we shall endeavor to show how certain emotions may be expressed in music, which will be followed by a list of the best compositions for the purpose of portraying such emotions.

IMPROVISING.

Improvising and synchronizing in motion picture music cannot be thought of apart, for improvising is "temperamental synchronization." Synchronization is the welding of picture movement and music movement, the matching of picture mood with music mood, the merging of picture and music in a unit of effect. This phrase is quite a mouthful, yet its meaning is clear. In two words it expresses the instant response on the part of the musician and music, to the "temperamental" (that is to say the emotional) situation the picture portrays. It creates that bond of sympathy and interest between audience and "show" which is the prime factor in the former's enjoyment of the latter.

Merely "timing" is not the true secret of successful improvising. It has its decided advantages, but its evident limitations as well. Adaptability, quickness in handling unforeseen contingencies developed in the projection of the pictures themselves, contingencies which call for instant decision on the part of the musical leader, a sense of fitness for "local color" are far more important. Imagination, constant attention to the principle of "flexible tempos," and absolute cooperation with the film operator at all times must underlie any motion picture improvising that deserves the name.

Every leader of a moving picture orchestra has his own detail methods of working out his musical synchronization. But "improvising," the ability to duplicate, at a moment's notice if necessary, the dramatic action, mood and atmosphere of the film picture in music, is its foundation. Thus, color, contrast and continuity of idea are secured, and the orchestra sounding smoothly and naturally through all changes of scene and action.

RIALTO OFFERS VARIED PROGRAM.

During the week of May 1st, the writer was greatly interested in listening to a musical program at the Rialto, which consisted of folk melodies and fragments of selections from over nine different nations. The following is a partial list: "Overture 1812," Tchaikowsky, France and Russia; "East Indian Love Lyrics," Woodford Finden, India; "Goodbye," Tosti, Italy; "Snow-Breasted Pearl," Ireland; "Prince of Pilsen," Germany; "English Folk Tunes;" "Hands Across the Sea," Sousa, and "Star Spangled Banner," America. Special mention might be made of the Finden Indian Love Lyrics, which are delightfully orchestrated, and lend themselves well for the purpose of creating an Oriental atmosphere.

WHAT MEMORIZING MEANS TO A CONDUCTOR.

THAT memory plays a most important part in the life of every director, organist or pianist is superfluous to mention. The tremendous growth of the moving picture business has made directors of many a mediocre violinist and pianist who, perhaps, having served many years in an orchestra is able to take over the burdens of a director. They have acquired a large enough repertoire to handle moving picture playing successfully. Understand, we speak of the small town orchestra which prior to the expansion of the photoplay was able to support only a pianist or a pianist and violinist. Since the propaganda of music with the pictures has spread throughout the country, the first and most essential attribute of a conductor is that he possess a repertoire of the best known overtures, classics, both old and new, together with the best known opera selections, and plenty of musical comedy for variety's sake. He must have at all times on the ends of his fingers, as it were, a collection of memorized compositions that he may suggest for pictures depicting various emotions and atmospheres.

To some, memorizing is a very difficult process because the mind has never been schooled along these lines, while to others it means comparatively little effort. A certain well known accompanist who invariably plays without his notes often memorizes or visualizes entire programs while en route without the assistance of any instrument. This process of making pictures on the mind is called visualization.

Visual images may be tested by trying to describe minutely the furnishings of a room visited at some former time, descriptions of people met on other occasions, their hair, faces, clothing, et cetera. Visual images are often most pronounced in women and children, while with men, especially the business man who is accustomed to think in abstract forms, the visual images are apt to be dim. People accustomed to visualizing are usually very receptive, enthusiastic and highly imaginative.

Take a bar or two of some composition you are not familiar with, observe its signature, length and location of every note, then close the music and write all the details which were left to mental images. This may seem a long, slow process, but once established will always remain and will need but a refreshing of the memory a few times a year in order that it may not be pushed into the background and grow a bit rusty. It was this art which Mozart possessed in a very marked degree and that enabled him at the age of twelve to write out completely after once hearing the Miserere, a composition which was not permitted to be taken from the Sistine Chapel of the Vatican nor to be copied.

Other points we might mention in the memorizing of a score are: Refer as seldom as possible to the composition before you; never leave a passage until it is firmly fixed in your mind; make sure you know it thoroughly before leaving, if necessary go over it four or five times. This will avoid the repeating of it the next time you review the piece. Do not practice mechanically but concentrate. Cultivate rapid thinking, for one must think as fast as the composition is to be played.

It has often struck me that a majority of the professional musicians of the present day are surprisingly ignorant of the musical literature that lies outside of their special field. With the orchestra leader, he has no special field, for it is necessary that he use selections taken from every different division of the great library of music. Hence he must be continually storing up in his memory for future use. New pictures are being released daily which create weighty problems for the conductor unless he is the possessor of an extended repertoire. Cinematography is traveling toward perfection by leaps and bounds. With her should go music, hand in hand. The question is, "Is the music in our theaters of higher grade today than it was yesterday?" In many theaters it is and in many places it neither progresses nor falls backward, but remains in the balance. This is a condition which should not be tolerated by the manager.

As we have said before, it is necessary for the director to know hundreds if not thousands of lesser selections. Everyone can think of many selections which he could not recall for the life of him, but which he would know intimately as soon as he heard them. The problem here is to convert this passing knowledge into prompt and spontaneous knowledge.

A matter upon which it is impossible to lay too much stress is accuracy. To cite an example, but yesterday I heard the charming little Barcarolle, op. 37, of Tchaikowski, played as an accompaniment to a film at a tempo which made one's blood boil. Why is it conductors so dote on "individual touches"? Is it pure ignorance? Most of the classics are generally marked with tempo markings so that there is no excuse for such mutilation.

The best memory is a careful cultivation of the faculty of accurate remembrance. Try to do something each day toward the enlarging of your repertoire and you will find yourself qualified within a short time to command a better position than that which you now hold.

VICTOR HERBERT THE COMPOSER.

Victor Herbert, the celebrated composer and conductor, is without question the greatest of American melody writers. He was born in Dublin, Ireland, in 1859, and lived in Germany eighteen years. In 1886, he was cello solo player in the Metropolitan Orchestra, New York City, and in 1894 became bandmaster to the Twenty-second Regiment Band of New York, subsequently conducting the Pittsburgh Orchestra. In 1904 he formed his own orchestra, with which he toured the United States. He is the composer of the greatest list of successful light operas in America, besides having composed for several cinedramas. Among Mr. Herbert's light opera offerings are the following: "Prince Ananias," "Wizard of the Nile," "Gold Bug," "Singing Girl," "The Serenade," "Idol's Eye," "Fortune Teller," "Ameer," "The Viceroy," "Babes in Toyland," "Babette," "It Happened in Nordland," "Wonderland," "Miss Dolly Dollars," "The Red Mill," "Mlle. Modiste," "The Tattooed Man," "Algeria," "Prima Donna," "Little Nemo," "The Madcap Duchess," "The Enchantress," "Sweethearts," "The Only Girl," "Princess Pat" and "Eileen."

Mr. Herbert is also the composer of two grand operas—"Natoma," produced at the Metropolitan Opera House in 1911, and "Madeline," produced early in 1914.

GALAXY OF ORCHESTRA MUSIC.

Many exhibitors are of the opinion that the Schirmer Co. has entirely given up the publishing of moving picture scores. "As a matter of fact, this company has gone deeper than ever into the publishing of film accompaniments and incidental music to be used with the pictures," says Mr. Roerber of the orchestra department. "This company has on the market at the present time a serial publication, two additional numbers being issued on the first of each month. This Galaxy of Orchestra Music, as it is called, has increased in size from its beginning until there are now in this collection ninety-five numbers. Through this collection a conductor who previously has had a very limited repertoire is now enabled to make a satisfactory selection of appropriate music at a few moments' notice as well as being able to use the same numbers for concert use."

This galaxy has not been published in the piano score alone, but is now in the process of preparation. In order that an idea may be gained as to the type compositions included in this collection we are listing a few of those included on the index page, namely, Moorish Serenade, Dance of the Egyptians, Norwegian Suite, Funeral March and Selections from the Emerald Isle.

By Clarence E. Sinn.

IN ISSUES of April 21 and May 5 examples were given showing how we may modulate quickly to keys one half tone higher and to keys a whole note higher. As said before, one does not usually care to make such abrupt transitions of key, but at times it is essential; and at such times one may be glad to have these tables at his finger tips. The examples illustrated a direct modulation by means of one connecting chord. We now present tables showing how to change quickly from any key to a key one whole tone lower. Examples 20 and 22 illustrate how this may be done through a single chord. As in the preceding examples, we

C. to B^b B^b to A^b A^b to G^b (G^b is the same as F[#])
F[#] to E[#] E to D. D to C.

Ex. 20.

A. (Tonic chord.) (Dominant.) (Dom. 7th) (Tonic.)
B. Dominant 7th
C. (Some inversions of Dominant 7th resolving to tonic chord; dom. 7th in half notes, tonic in quarter notes.)

Ex. 21.

aimed at the dominant 7th of the new key, and not at the tonic chord. For instance, in the first measure of Ex. 20 we modulate from the key of C to that of B flat—one tone lower. Our first thought is, not of the chord of B flat (the tonic chord), but the dominant 7th of B flat—which is built upon the note "F."

(C^b or B^b) B^b to A^b A to G. G to F.
F. to E^b. E^b to D^b D^b to C^b

Ex. 22.

Example 21 shows the dominant 7th of B flat in several positions (inversions) and how it naturally resolves to its tonic chord.

Observe that no matter what the position (inversion) of the chord may be, it still contains the same notes, viz.: F, A/C and E flat, and is therefore the same chord. (This holds good with any chord and its inversions.)

Let us return to Ex. 20. We wish to modulate from C to B flat. We are playing the chord of C, and the quickest way to modulate will be to change that chord of C to the dominant 7th of B flat (which is the chord of F with an E flat added). The first measure in Ex. 20 shows how this change is made. Of course the chords do not have to be in the particular positions given in the example. Other positions are shown in Ex. 21 (letter "C"), which illustrates different positions of the dominant 7th and shows each one of these chords resolving to the tonic chord (B flat).

The remaining measures in Ex. 20 show the same modulation to keys one note higher.

Example 22 continues the illustration beginning with the key of C flat (which is the same as B natural) and ending with the D flat modulating to C flat. These two examples (20 and 22) complete the circle of twelve keys, and illustrate a means of modulating through a single chord from any key to the one a note lower. Modulating from one key to the key a half note lower presents difficulties. For instance, if we are playing in the key of C and wish to change suddenly to the key of B natural (or C flat—they are the same), we find on examining the dominant 7th of the new key that it has not one note in common with the chord of C. Now in all of the previous examples we have found at least one note in the old chord which was the same as some note in the modulating chord. This we used as a "pivot." But in progressing from the key of C to that of B natural, if we try to go directly to the new key's dominant 7th (which is the chord of F sharp with an E natural added) there is not one note in common between the two chords—C and F sharp.

C to B^b B^b to B B to A^b

Ex. 23.

G^b to F. F to E[#]. E[#] to E^b

Ex. 24.

All my previous examples have shown modulations by means of a dominant 7th, and I wish this one to be the same; if not through a single modulating chord, then by means of two chords.

Example 23 and Example 24 give illustrations of how this may be done. It does not modulate through a single chord like the others, but it is sufficiently short for so abrupt a change. One does not care to make these abrupt changes unless one must, but it is good to know ways of making such quick transitions when they are needful.

These tables may be played just as they are sometimes when improvising; such sequences of chords will often provide an agreeable interruption between melodies. Indeed a melody can be made out of a phrase such as one of these tables give. Or a melody can be built upon such sequences of chords. Witness Wallace's "Prayer" in Maritana.

EFFICIENCY.

THOSE of us who are engaged in the musical end of the moving picture business will do well to pause once in a while and ask ourselves the question, "How can we become more efficient in our work?" What is this efficiency of which we are continually hearing so much?

The power of doing one's best and most in the shortest time and easiest way to the satisfaction of all concerned, that is efficiency. It would surely be an excellent thing to meditate and see if we are accomplishing the results we should, with the effort expended. If not why not?

For the purpose of occasionally measuring ourselves by certain authorized standards of living we are placing before you a few of the questions which may be applied to advantage daily, regarding the technic of living.

Do you like your work?

Have you learned the best, quickest and easiest way of doing it?

Have you learned the science of planning your day ahead?

Are you saving money systematically?

As a means of efficiency study do you use magazines on self improvement and on the technical or vocational side of your work?

Do you study yourself, your greatest ambitions or aspirations, your capacities and drawbacks, your past and present advancement, your technic of skill and personal character?

Are all your expenses standardized?

These few questions may or may not be applied to our personal lives. They are, however, given that we may see wherein we fall short in our business relations.

FRANK E. KNEELAND.

THE OLD VERSUS THE NEW.

When we think of the moving picture show of but a few years ago, it causes a shiver to travel rapidly up and down the spinal column. The "Black Hole of Calcutta" had nothing on those old theaters, as we would say in the language of the street. They were everything a theater should not have been, and yet they were the best the town afforded, and every town possessed one or more. Why? Because mothers and fathers were content to let their children inhabit such places, and even enjoyed going themselves, occasionally. Generally in these small town houses or "nickel-odcons" as they became known later, there were no ventilating systems whatsoever, and often a wood fire raged in one corner of the room. The place was equipped with the cheapest machine possible, hence the films were so uneven that it was a small wonder people ever emerged with any eyesight at all. Children and grown-ups were allowed to indulge in refreshments, which had a muffling effect on the noise of the so-called music as it poured forth from an old square in the corner of the room, which had seen its best days some years previous.

Often have I seen a girl with a book—some tender romance, perhaps—seated at the piano, jamming down any keys that might get in the way of her fingers, but progressing exceedingly well with the story as she diffused sounds Straus, Ornstein or Strawinsky might have paled to hear.

The music? Well, it was a thing to forget as soon as possible. But now let us look for a moment into the moving picture theater of today, not of the future, but an institution which is here permanently. We pass through the spacious lobby into the auditorium, equipped with several thousand orchestra chairs and surely everything in the way of hangings the eye might delight in. Before us is stationed an orchestra of nearly fifty players augmented by an organ capable of producing hundreds of wonderful combinations. Here we also hear artists of international reputation, supported by the orchestra, together with startling scenic effects, that the composition rendered may be transmitted to the audience under the best conditions possible.

You say "Isn't it marvelous?" and quickly glance at me from out the corner of your eye to see whether or not you have been indulging in a delightful little dream, and re-plate into thoughts of the old picture show we used to attend in contrast to the one we are now gazing at, where each screen actor has his or her theme in the orchestra and where each bit of atmosphere or action is reinforced by appropriate music.

As we watched that tremendous audience sitting almost silent before the screen and apparently so absorbed in thought that the spirit of silence seemed to communicate itself to those portions of the program where no picture was being shown. The keen, alert manager has observed this and has made a special point of giving to his audience at these points the best music possible, something which compelled their attention as the films had done. Had this same manager used light, trashy music at this juncture, we should have found an audience who persisted in trying to drown the orchestra by their chatter. Hence it follows that cheap, obvious music cannot be too quickly suppressed by the manager who desires success, since it plays a most important part in the entertainment. With the attentive audience has come the surprising revelation that the music which the "man in the street" likes best in the long run is the same as that which the "high-brow" has placed the stamp of approval on.

So it develops that the modern moving picture audience finds itself in a better mood to appreciate Douglas Fairbanks, Mary Pickford or Charles Chaplin, after having listened to a Wagnerian overture or a movement from one of the classic symphonies.

Does a theater managed on so pretentious a scale pay? New York says it does. The old-time "movie" is a thing of the past, and the new photoplay theater enters on an area of greater works.

FRANK E. KNEELAND.

INSURES FULL HOUSE FOR SECOND SHOW.

By entertaining the "hold out" with good music this exhibitor found that he could hold twice as many people in his lobby as he could without it. He always had a good house for his second show and the slight expense of a victrola, even if bought on the instalment plan, is a very small item when compared to the hundreds of dollars that it will add to the box office in a few months' time.

We are indeed glad to learn that this plan has been tested out with success in a house the size of the Alhambra. Within the past month we have mentioned this idea to several exhibitors who have complained that they were unable to hold their crowds behind closed doors from show to show. Do not imagine that a talking machine the kind you may be able to pick up some place for a few dollars or cents with several scratchy ragtime records is the kind that is going to hold your public. Decidedly not; the public has arrived at the point where they will be satisfied only with the best. The theaters which are offering the best in music and pictures are the ones that are making the money. This department will be glad to submit a list of records to any exhibitor interested in this plan.

SCORE TO "THE HAND THAT ROCKS THE CRADLE"

The arrangement of the score for the film production of "The Hand that Rocks the Cradle," now being exhibited at the Broadway Theater, was made by Mr. Hugo Reisenfeld, of the Rialto. The arrangement is an excellent one and is as follows:

Athalia Overture, Mendelssohn; Romance, Grunfeld; Le Retour, Bizet; Dreams, Greig; Nocturne, Karganoff; Cradle Song, Brahms; Chanson Triste, Tschaikowski; Serenade, Rubinstein; Intermezzo, Whelpley; Liebestreu, Brahms; Adieux, Karganoff; Vain Suit, Brahms.

By Clarence E. Sinn.

EXAMPLE 29½ shows new dominant 7ths produced by lowering other notes in our diminished 7th. Notice the first line (marked 1). We start with the dominant 7th of the key of F. Diminish it by sharpening the lower note (C). Now let us lower the second note from the top (G to G flat). We now have the dominant 7th of the key of C flat. (The C sharp is now converted to D flat—an enharmonic change.)

Or we can lower the note G to F sharp—the same thing—

(1.) (G to Gb)
Dominant 7th (Diminished 7th) Dom⁷t 7th of C^b. (or.) D major. (minor)

(2.) (E to Eb)
Diminished 7th Dom⁷t 7th of A^b major. (minor.)

(3.) (C to Cb)

Ex. 29½.

and get a dominant 7th of B natural—which sounds the same as C flat. In the second line of Example 29½ (the one marked 2) we lower the note E a half tone (E to E flat). This gives us the dominant 7th chord of A flat (our C sharp being converted to D flat).

The part marked 3 shows the note C sharp lowered a half tone, which gives us the dominant 7th of F—the key we started from.

Enharmonic Changes.

In two instances above we said C sharp is converted to D flat. On the piano and organ these two notes are identical; they are played on the same key, and sound the same. The only difference is in its relation to a chord, or in the manner in which it is written. When you get used to thinking of the dominant 7th chord in every key and how it resolves to its own tonic chord, you cannot help but think of the exact notes in the chord. In example 29½, line 2, we have lowered our E to E flat. We now have a chord which sounds all right, but does not resemble any things we have so far seen. However, when we think of the note C sharp as D flat, we at once recognize the chord as the dominant 7th of the key of A flat.

Example 30 may make this plainer. It shows four different keys, viz., the key of F, the key of A flat, of C flat and of

W. (Diminished 7th)
C[#] E^b G^b B^b

X. E^b G^b B^b D^b

Y. G^b B^b D^b F^b

Z. A[#] C[#] E^b G^b

Ex. 30.

D. These are marked respectively W, X, Y and Z. Each shows first the tonic chord, then the dominant 7th of its particular key (F, A flat, C flat or D).

The first line (marked W) we have seen before in preceding examples. The second line, X, is in the key of A flat. Dominant 7th built on E flat. Raising this note to E natural produces chord of the diminished 7th. Examples Y and Z are similar. The diminished 7th chords are shown, first in separate notes, then in chords in all four positions. Compare the last two measures of each line (the chords in half notes), play them together, study them well and you will understand how one may be converted to the other—mentally—while playing.

VICTROLA IN LOBBY HOLDS BUSINESS.

The Alhambra theater of Cleveland, Ohio, placed a very handsome victrola in the lobby of the theater for the entertainment of the huge crowds that were kept standing in the lobby awaiting the second show.

Did it pay?

"It certainly did," said the manager, "and it was a case of traceable returns, too. People are not fond of standing up for an hour or so under any circumstances, and our greatest problem was to hold the people who came to the theater until we could get them seated. It is very poor business to spend a lot of money in advertising to draw people to your theater and then let them go elsewhere because you cannot seat them."

"ONE LAW FOR BOTH."

The musical accompaniment to the film drama, "One Law for Both," while composed of many of the best classics, is not arranged as to build up a greater support for each climax. Therein lies the art of arranging for the moving picture, to employ music solely to accentuate the effect of the picture.

The Rachmaninoff Prelude in C sharp minor is used as an overture, which is followed by the opening theme of the Tchaikowski, March Slave, an excellent theme for such a picture but in coupling this theme with the Old English melody, "The Lass with a Delicate Air," played both in the major and minor, the beauty of the former theme is lost and the favorite Arne melody is for a time shorn of its beauty.

Among other numbers used in this score are: Waltz of the Flowers from the Nutcracker Suite of Tchaikowski, Night Song, Schumann; Rapsody No. 2, Liszt Overture to the Merry Wives of Windsor, Nicolai, and Elysium by Oley Speaks.

FAIRBANKS CONTEMPLATING TOUR ABROAD.

Douglas Fairbanks is entertaining the thought of touring around the world next summer provided war conditions do not interfere with his present plans. It is his intention to do a series of five-reel plays for release through the Artcraft, dealing with an American touring abroad, whose romance takes him to the various foreign countries. He will be accompanied on this trip by Director John Emerson and four prominent players. Director John Emerson has purchased a theme upon which will be based these European releases. The combined dramatic and educational value of these Artcraft pictures should create a tremendous demand for them from exhibitors.

DAZEY MOVES TO SANTA BARBARA.

Charles T. Dazy has severed his connection with the Lasky Company and has moved himself to Santa Barbara, where he will henceforth write for the American Film Company. Mr. Dazy, it will be remembered, was known for his plays "In Old Kentucky" and "Home Folks" before he began writing for the screen. Some of his latest successes are "Manhattan Madness," "Wolf Lowry," "The Flower of Faith," etc. Mr. Dazy's son Frank will collaborate with him in writing for the American.

By Clarence E. Sinn.

IN Example 29 and 29½ we see a dominant 7th of the key of F converted to a diminished 7th (by raising the fundamental C to C sharp—a half tone), and how by lowering a half tone any other note in the resultant chord we may obtain a dominant 7th of some other key. To complete the circle we will now give two other examples, viz.: Example 31 and Example 32. Example 31 is in the key of C, and the first chord shown is the dominant 7th of the key of C. You will notice that this chord is built upon "G" (the dominant of C) and, counting upward, reads "G, B, D and F." This last note being a seventh above its fundamental (G) gives the chord the name of the "dominant 7th." Now by raising the fundamental "G" a half tone we get a diminished 7th, exactly as we did in Ex. 29, but in another key. By lowering the G again we of course will get the same dominant 7th we started with—the dominant 7th of the key of C. Now the notes in the chord being of equal distance (as explained before) we can lower any other note in the diminished 7th chord and get some other dominant 7th, exactly as in Ex.

Dom. 7th; Dim. 7th to Key of A Dom. 7th; Dim. 7th to Key of Gb

Dom. 7th; Dim. 7th to Key of Eb Dom. 7th; Dim. 7th to Key of C

EX. 31.

29½. Ex. 31 shows, first the top note "F" lowered a half tone (to E natural), and the resultant chord which is a dominant 7th of A. The resolution is here given as the chord of A major, but it can resolve to A minor as well. The next alteration of the same diminished 7th shows the note "D" lowered a half tone. It now becomes D flat, and (with the enharmonic change illustrated—in brackets) becomes a dominant 7th of the key of G flat (or G flat minor). The other two alterations in Ex. 31 give us modulations to the key of E flat and the key of C again—the original key.

Example 32 is in the key of B flat, the dominant 7th of which is built upon the note "F." By diminishing this chord as in the preceding examples we get another chord of the diminished 7th with its four modulations.

Dom. 7th; Dim. 7th to Key of G. Dom. 7th; Dim. 7th to Key of E.

Dom. 7th; Dim. 7th to Key of Db Dom. 7th; Dim. 7th to Key of Bb

Now as I said before, these examples are simple matters to students of harmony, but interesting for all that. To readers not familiar with these chords and their possibilities, I will say that a mere cursory reading will benefit you not at all. You must play them and work them out and make yourself thoroughly familiar with their sound. You must learn to instantly recognize a dominant 7th of any key when you play it, no matter what its position may be. And their chief use to the improviser will be found, not for the sole purpose of making abrupt modulations (although this has been kept in the foreground), but in the variety of progressions they permit when improvising a connecting phrase—long or short.

Chords Having One or More Notes in Common.

With few exceptions any chord can progress directly to any other chord when the two contain one note in common. For example, the chord of C contains three notes. The first note "C" is also found in the chord of A flat, the chord of F, the chord of A minor, the dominant 7th of the key of G, and the diminished 7th chords shown in Ex. 32. The next note "E" is likewise related to other chords, and through them to other keys. The same can be said of the note "G."

Example 33 illustrates this relationship of the chords.

These chords all contain the note "C."

EX. 33.

The single measure above is a tonic chord of the key of C. The group of measures below it show the tonic chords of A minor, F major and A flat major, and the dominant 7th of the key of G. Each of the chords shown contains the note "C," and you can progress directly to any one of these keys from the key of C without preparation.

GUNKLER COMPLETES MUSICAL SETTING.

Herman Gunkler, a well known musician of this city, who was formerly connected with the Strand Theater of Chicago, has just completed a musical setting for the eight-reel feature, "The Curse of Iku." Mr. Gunkler has made a very good selection of numbers calculated to enhance the Japanese atmosphere (musically) and permit an enjoyable program as well. With his ability and experience in this line of work, Mr. Gunkler should do more of it.

COLONEL WESTGARD REACHES DENVER.

Col. A. L. Westgard, of the Pathe-Combitone Expedition, arrived with his fleet of automobiles in Denver, Colo., recently, and is making that city his headquarters while he is engaged in filming the chief points of interest readily accessible to that city. The Expedition has already covered 13,000 miles in the States of Colorado, New Mexico, Arizona, California and Texas, all by motor car.

To date about 60,000 feet of film have been made of the chief points of interest in the territory covered. Col. Westgard plans to take about 30,000 feet in the State of Colorado alone, the best portions of which only will be released. At the present time he is devoting much attention to the Pike's Peak region and also to the National Parks and similar points of national interest around Denver. Not only will the chief scenic regions of the section be taken, but he has mapped out a comprehensive itinerary which includes the most notable agricultural and industrial sections of the State.

VICTOR MOORE STARTS WORK AT KLEVER STUDIOS.

Victor Moore (Paramount release) and his comedy players started work on Tuesday, July 10, at the new Klever Pictures Studio which has just been completed at Baldwin, Long Island. Thomas J. Gray is writing the scenarios. The company includes D. L. Don and Emma Littlefield.

The Music Copyright Question.

THE drastic tax on music being imposed by the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers has stirred up a feeling of bitter resentment among the exhibitors of moving pictures. And this feeling is not without reason. The music publishers declare emphatically that the movement was fostered and engineered by the authors and composers primarily and that they—the publishers—were compelled to come in as a matter of self-preservation. That part of the question doesn't matter now. The fact remains that the publishers are affiliated with the prime movers (the authors and composers) and that all three must sink or swim together—with the odds in favor of swimming for a time at least. The publishers also assert that the bulk of the revenue from the music tax goes to the authors and composers and a relatively small part to the publishers. That does not interest us so much at present. We don't care so much who gets it, as who gives it.

For the past twenty-five years the music publishers have been frantically creating an artificial condition in the trade which was bound to result sooner or later in chaos. They entered a business which was comparatively small, safe and conservative. By over-stimulation they created a business which became inflated, top-heavy, and bound to fall of its own weight. Each firm employed an expensive staff (under salary) to promote their songs and create a public demand for the same. Professional singers were furnished with free songs. Not only that, a staff of piano players were maintained in each house to teach these songs, a staff of arrangers to make free orchestrations (if the free published arrangements did not happen to lay in the singer's range) and in many cases a bonus or premium was paid to singers for singing these songs. The tons of free music which has been distributed to band and orchestra leaders (usually in specially made arrangements) must amount to an enormous figure. The music publishers taught everybody connected with the show business to regard free music as a right and not a privilege. They have taught us that we were doing them a favor in playing and singing their music—and quite often we were. For a while the profits were big. The writers of successful songs were engaged and placed on the staff of one firm or another—to keep a competitor from getting his future output. Royalties were fair; in some cases generous. But the ever-growing competition and fierce rivalry brought an ever-growing expense. Of the stream of money flowing in, another large stream flowed out. And this last stream has been steadily increasing, while the first—if it has not been diminishing—has certainly not been growing. Authors and composers are now getting as low as one-half of one per cent. in royalties—when they get anything. And now the present decade is expected to repay the sinners for their own mistakes made in the past.

So far as the authors and composers are concerned, they are not the wolves we are apt to picture in our first burst of indignation. They are trying to get what they consider a proper remuneration for their work and talent. So far as the publishers are concerned, they are perhaps the victims of circumstances; said circumstances being created by themselves collectively, and later, suffered for individually.

And now we are to hold the bag.

Nobody will dispute that the writer or producer should have a fair recompense for his efforts; the more worthy his efforts the greater his recompense. Nobody will begrudge the publisher a fair profit for his investment, nor a fair remuneration for his services. All of these people are at the very foundation of the show business. They furnish the biggest part of our working tools and they have a right to pay for the same. But we resent being coddled along all these years, receiving goods for nothing which in the very nature of things should have been paid for, and then suddenly held up and told to "stand and deliver." To deliver not only the price of the goods, but a big premium besides in the shape of royalties (or as they prefer to call it, a "music tax"). Now I don't believe anybody would object if the so-called "free list" were stopped entirely. It should never have existed in the first place. Musicians and others should be willing enough to pay the price for their music. It constitutes a part of their working tools. But we do object to paying not only for the music, but for the privilege of using it. The argument that in playing the music in public we are "selling it" to the audience may be sound in law, but under present conditions is most unfair in principle.

Why in the name of common sense did they not, if the business did not pay, why, I say, did they not cut out the free music and charge a price for their goods which would make it pay; make it pay everything including royalties which are a legitimate part of the expense?

Exhibitors all over the country are trying to get together (I won't say "organizing") for the purpose of fighting this condition. It is respectfully suggested that exhibitors will do well to move carefully. Don't let your indignation run away with your judgment. It is not wise to send your money to any fund for fighting this condition unless that fund is for the sole purpose of getting this law repealed. It has been suggested that exhibitors seek injunctions on the A. S. of C., A. & P. charging restraint of trade. It has been suggested that they be fought as a "trust." The publishers assert that inasmuch as there is no price fixing among them, there is no trust and no restraint of trade. I am informed by a Chicago attorney that the Society's position is sound in law.

This law is a Federal law and as such we are bound to obey it. We have only two courses open to us in opposition to it. We can refuse to use their music or we can work to have the law repealed. Don't spend your money on anybody who tells you you can do anything else, for you will only waste it if you do.

Moving picture theaters are not so dependent on popular music as they think they are. It is true, we like to keep up to date and give our patrons the newest and the best, but in music for the picture the newest is not always the best. Generally the "popular" number has nothing whatever to recommend but its newness. Lots of the old music is available and does not come under this copyright protection. Mr. G. Schirmer has stated in an open letter that his copyrighted musical publications (with cited exceptions) may be publicly performed without restriction. Please do not take this too literally. Mr. G. Schirmer has a splendid catalog, but many of the numbers are the product of members of the Am. Society of C., A. and P., and as such are best let alone unless you have a license to use them. It may be that a further interpretation of the publishers' rights to a piece of music may be asked for in the courts, but I doubt it. It appears to be definitely settled now. Mr. G. Schirmer and other large dealers can furnish you with a catalog of music which is not controlled by the aforesaid society. In that way he can help you best if he wants to help you. But you cannot use a number on his catalog written by Victor Herbert, Rudolph Friml or any other member of the society unless you are duly licensed by the society. No dealer is going to pay your court expenses or fines, and no judge will take for an excuse that you "didn't know," or that so-and-so told you it "would be all right." If the exhibitors really organize and present a really solid front, they can by refusing to play the late music so reduce the sales and profits as to compel the society to try some other tactics. Probably they will take off the tax and increase slightly the cost price of the music. If one exhibitor in a neighborhood pays the tax and uses the popular stuff, and the other exhibitors become frightened at a possible chance of losing some trade thereby—well, they will all run for a license. It is this very thing upon which the society is building its hopes. Will the exhibitors stick together for a common cause? The society thinks not. Will each exhibitor try to get the better of his rival in business, if only for a week or a day? The society thinks he will. We can only wait and see.

Improvising (Part II)

IN ISSUE of July 28 (page 637) Moving Picture World, was shown an example of progression from one chord to another through means of one note held in common by both chords. Example 33 illustrates the tonic chord of C, and shows four other chords (or keys) each having a note which is contained in the chord of C. In the illustration (Ex. 33) the note in question is "C" which—as shown—is also contained in the chords of A minor, F major and the dominant 7th of the key of G major. (This note "C" is also found in the chords of F minor and the dominant 7th of the key of G minor.) A sort of relationship is thus established between the chord of C and other chords containing the note "C."

Observe the two other notes in the chord of C ("E" and "G"). Each one of these notes may be found in other chords beside the chord of C. Example 34 shows three chords (besides the C chord) containing the note "G," and three containing the note "E."

These notes in the chord of C (viz.: "C," "E" and "G") being also found in chords of other keys, establish a more or less close relationship with those other keys. Examples 33 and 34 illustrate simple and natural progressions from the chord of C to the following keys.

Through the note "G;" Key of G, key of E-flat and key of D (through dominant 7th of key of D).

Through the note "E;" Key of A, key of E.

Through the note "C;" Key of A minor, key of F major, key of A-flat major and key of G (through dominant 7th).

In the last measure of example 34 we find a progression from key of C to the key of B natural. In all previous examples in modulating from one key to another I have endeavored to give preference to modulation through dominant 7th's. That is, when using an intervening chord between. From the key of C to that of B natural is a half tone progression downward. Descending chords by half-tones is difficult. In an earlier article a table was shown giving one means of this progression. To go directly to the dominant 7th of B natural from the chord of C makes too great a contrast to give pleasant results. I have used instead another chord as a pivot in modulating from C to B natural. For this particular progression (downward in half-tones) one will find it preferable to use two or more intervening chords.

In Ex. 35 I have shown the progression (pivoting on the note "E") from the chord of "C" to the dominant 7th of B natural. Next, from the chord of "C" to another chord (augmented 6th) to key of B natural. The two examples in the lower part of Ex. 35 show progressions through two intervening chords—all pivoting upon the note "E."

The Garden of Allah.

E. James, Chicago, writes: "Can you kindly give me any information regarding the exquisite incidental music to the 'Garden of Allah' (Selig Special)?"

The music incidental to this artistic Selig production was compiled by Mr. Harry Alford of Chicago, Illinois. A great part of the music is original with Mr. Alford, and was composed by him especially for this picture. Mr. Alford conducts a bureau for arranging, copying and composing music, and is the best equipped for work of this sort of any man in the west. He has made musical settings and orchestral scores for a number of special pictures, among them the "Garden of Allah." Numerous inquiries similar to the one above have been received concerning this picture, and the writers will please consider this an answer to all.

New Picture Music.

Mr. Joseph Carl Breil, the man who composed and compiled the music for "The Birth of a Nation," has, through Chappell & Co., Ltd., issued a brand new collection of incidental music for use in playing for the picture. This collection contains twelve original numbers presented in a novel form. Nine of these numbers are divided into parts marked "A," "B," and "C." Each of these lettered themes is complete in itself, yet related to the others. The idea being that a chosen theme can be amplified or carried to its logical conclusion through one or both of the succeeding themes. For example, No. 7, is arranged in this manner:

1 (A)—To depict a conspiracy or burglary with (B) consequent tumult or escape.

2 (A)—A dismal forest or desert scene with (B) pursuit by wild beasts or bandits.

3 (A)—An approaching storm and (B), its unleashing.

A dainty little conceit is No. 10, opening with a recitative in which the music seems to ask a question. It is divided thus:

"The question" (A) a doubtful or embarrassing moment followed by (B) threat, decision or resolution.

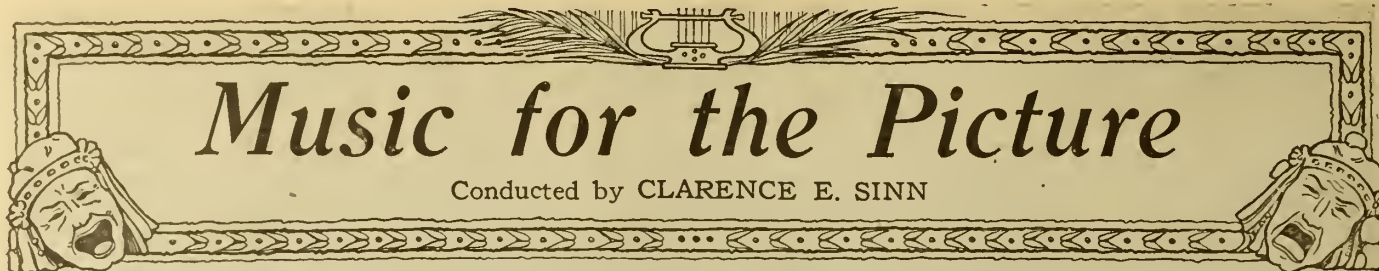

Mr. Breil has a number of other good things to his credit, having compiled and composed the incidental music to "Intolerance," and other pictures; has composed the music to the opera "The Legend" (anew work), and will be best remembered as composer of the music to the playlet, "The Climax," a success of some years ago. His song, "The Climax," is still a popular number among the better class of soprani.

NEW THEATER AT RADFORD, VA.

The new Colonial Theater at Radford, Va., is nearing completion and will open Oct. 10 with the "Birth of a Nation." The new house will have a seating capacity of about seven hundred. It will be a decided credit to a city of five thousand and population. The management will offer both pictures and legitimate, keeping open all the time with pictures when other shows are not booked. The city has been without a large house for years and is looking forward to the opening. It will be run under the management of Painter and Lane.

ALMA RUEBEN IN "THE FIREFLY OF TOUGH LUCK."

Alma Rueben, whose beauty and finished delineations have attracted remark from critics and fans, will from henceforth be featured in Triangle plays, the first one selected for her being "The Firefly of Tough Luck," in which Walt Whitman, the veteran character actor, will also have a leading part.

The Copyright Proprietor.

EXTRACT from the copyright law relating to public rendition of musical works: Section 25.

That if any person shall infringe the copyright in any work protected under the copyright laws of the United States such person shall be liable:

 (b.) To pay the copyright proprietors such damages as the copyright proprietor may have suffered, due to the infringement, as well as all the profits which the infringer shall have made from such infringement, etc., etc.

This law is intended to protect the producers of original musical compositions. The primal producer is, of course, the composer. He is the sole proprietor until he disposes of his property, and then the buyer becomes sole proprietor. The copyright law is designed to protect him (the proprietor) in "the monopoly that the law intends him to have." As to the publisher's rights, there is still some controversy, though I am informed that the recent court decision is plain on this point. Here are two different points of view:

G. Schirmer (Inc.) is sending the following notice to music dealers:

Gentlemen:—We write to advise that the copyright numbers of Friml and Herbert published by our firm are allowed to be played in public without the payment of a fee. We are not a member of the Society demanding fees for the performance of copyright works by small orchestras in restaurants and places of amusement.
 G. SCHIRMER (Inc.) Wholesale Department.

Here is an extract from an open letter to G. Schirmer (Inc.) signed by Victor Herbert, Harry B. Smith and others:

G. Schirmer (Inc.)—Gentlemen:—The announcement in your circular letter and advertisements that your copyright musical publications may be publicly performed in hotels, cabarets, restaurants and other resorts is absolutely misleading insofar as it relates to any of our respective compositions published by you, as you do not own or control the performing rights of any of our works nor the right to authorize the playing or singing thereof by anyone. As a music publisher, your rights in our works are strictly limited to their publication in sheet music form and to their reproduction in music records and rolls. You have no right to grant to theatrical managers, hotel, cabaret or other amusement proprietors public performance rights in our works. We propose to prosecute proprietors of restaurants and other places of entertainment using any of our works published by you, unless such persons secure from the American Society of C. A. & P. a license to publicly perform the same.

In response to letters sent to various publishers, Mr. Glen MacDonough, Secretary for the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers, wrote me a courteous letter, saying, among other things:

The house of Schirmer publishes works by Victor Herbert, but Schirmer does not own the performing rights. Victor Herbert, being a member of the Society, benefits from his performing rights, while his publisher has no interest. The same applies to other publishers in America who issue foreign works. The foreign composer, being a member of the Society by treaty, the American publisher (non-member of the Society) having no interest, nor a right to give permission to perform.

All this leads up to a question which may or may not come to an issue. For example, many American publishers issue standard music from the pens of the old masters. These are usually called re-prints, and a large part of them were printed in this country before a treaty was made with European countries regarding copyright protection. Publishers on this side of the water could publish any musical composition which had made a success in Europe without paying royalties unless the composition was also copyrighted in this country—which was seldom the case at that time. The American publishers simply "appropriated" the foreign composers' music, and copyrighted it under their own names. Look over the old catalogs of almost any American publisher. You will find compositions by Grieg, Offenbach, Mendelssohn, Schubert, Gounod, Wagner, Balfe, Verdi—a host of names representing the world's best music—all of them copyrighted by American publishers. You can buy the Suppe overtures copyrighted by Carl Fischer, copyrighted by Oliver Ditson, copyrighted by half a dozen American publishers; all holding (or claiming) copyright proprietorship over the same identical pieces. In what does their copyright proprietorship consist? On what do they base their claim for protection? Possibly on the "arrangement" of numbers—the orchestration. The composers of most of the old music passed away long before the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers was thought of. But their works are included in the catalogs of some of the publishers who are members of the Society. I don't believe it is their intention to try to collect a fee for the public performance of such works, but if they should do so, it will be interesting.

Carl Fischer publishes about everything of merit from the old composers (as well as the modern) and Carl Fischer is not a member of the Society. If you want to play safe you can select hundreds of numbers from the Fischer catalog, but be careful that the composer is an old one. Be sure he has been "de-composing" long enough.

The Federation of Musicians.

Local No. 10 (Chicago) of the American Federation of Musicians some time ago discussed the advisability of taking some action on the music tax question. Several plans were considered—some of which found their way into print—but no permanent action was taken. A letter from Joseph N. Weber (President of the national body) was sent to the various locals, a copy of which is here appended:

Ordered that all members he and they are hereby prohibited from playing all copyrighted musical compositions, whether from printed or written copies, or from memory, in any case where charges may be made by the composer or the American Association of Composers, Authors and Publishers, unless the members are directed by their employer to play such compositions.

This leaves it up to the musicians to supply themselves with music which does not come under the restrictions imposed by the society until such time as the employer decides to pay the tax, or otherwise. The Federation of Musicians is not contemplating any further action in the matter at present.

The Carl Fischer Music Publishing Company.

A letter from the above house contains this:

We wish to advise you that we are not members of either the American Society of Composers and Authors or of the French Society, and that there are no limitations on the performing rights of any of the compositions published and copyrighted by us. We have in our catalog, however, four works the copyright of which is not in our name, to wit:—
 Dubussy, "Arbesquest" (I and II).
 Puccini, "La Boheme" (Fantasie).
 Leoncavallo.
 Paggiacci (Selections).
 and as we are somewhat in doubt as to our performing rights in these numbers, we would not advise you publicly perform them unless you have been licensed by the copyright proprietors or the Society of C. A. and P. to do so.

Mr. Fischer also calls attention to the Witmark catalog taken over by his house some time ago. He says:

Not only are M. Witmark & Sons the owners of the copyrights of the orchestra and band compositions which we issue in their behalf, but they are also members of the American Society of C. A. and P. It is therefore necessary for a leader who contemplates using any of the Witmark prints to write direct to Witmark as to their stand with regard to that particular composition.

Suggested Music.

Here are a few old standards issued by Carl Fischer:
 Grand Opera Album (selections from Standard Operas; arranged by Charles J. Roberts).
 Album of Overtures (standard).
 Album of Strauss Waltzes.
 Album of Waldteufel Waltzes.

The Sam Fox Publishing Company, Cleveland, Ohio, also issues some very clever little concert numbers which are worth your while. Mr. Fox is not a member of the society, and I am told he asserts that he has no intention of joining. I am informed that none of his composers are members. (Sam Fox Library Orchestra Folios.)

Correspondents wishing answers to their letters will kindly send postage stamps. Two cents may not mean much to you, but in the aggregate they amount to a great deal to me.

Music Copyright Question

General Manager of American Exhibitors' Association Shows Futility of Opposing Existing Law on Subject.

By C. C. Pettijohn.

THE "running and not fighting" editorial in the Exhibitors' Trade Review last week is thoroughly in keeping with its policy to misrepresent and mislead exhibitors. The American Exhibitors' Association has no official organ, but we do appreciate the support of the numerous papers who believe we are right. This Association did not intend to say or do anything that might in the least discourage any man or set of men engaged in any fight for the exhibitor. We are compelled, however, after the publication of this intentionally misleading article to make this statement:

The organization of music composers and publishers, as the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers, comprising most of the well-known composers and publishers of America, England, Italy and Austria, was established for the purpose of issuing licenses to public resorts to play the copyrighted music of its membership. This society is operating under Section 1, Sub. Div. e of the Copyright Act, which secures to a musical author the exclusive right to perform the copyrighted musical composition publicly for profit.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Victor Herbert, the composer, against the Shanley Company, the cabaret restaurant on Broadway and 43d street, decided that the playing of copyrighted music in the dining room of a restaurant for the entertainment of guests during meal time by an orchestra was an infringement of the composer's copyright, the court holding that whether or not an admission fee is charged for entering the place of entertainment makes no difference.

The court said in January, 1917:

"If the rights under the copyright are infringed only by a performance where money is taken at the door they are imperfectly protected. Performances not different in kind from those of the defendants could be given that might compete with and even destroy the success of the monopoly that the law intends the plaintiffs to have. It is enough to say that there is no need to construe the statute so narrowly. The defendant's performances are not alms. They are part of a total for which the public pays, and the fact that the price of the whole is attributed to a particular item which those present are expected to order is not important. It is true that the music is not the sole object, but neither is the food, which probably could be got cheaper elsewhere. The object is a repast in surroundings that to people having limited powers of conversation or disliking the rival noise give a luxurious pleasure not to be had from eating a silent meal. If the music did not play it would be given up. If it pays, it pays out of the public's pocket. Whether it pays or not, the purpose of employing it is profit, and that is enough."

The question as to whether this decision applies to motion-picture theaters was submitted by the First National Exhibitors' Circuit, Inc., to A. L. Jacobs, a well-known theatrical lawyer, for his opinion. After a very careful consideration, Mr. Jacobs reached the conclusion that the decision in the Shanley case applies with equal force to motion-picture theaters.

The Brooklyn League of Motion Picture Exhibitors, we are reliably informed, submitted the same question to Edmund Wise, another well-known copyright specialist, practicing in New York City, and he expressed it as his opinion that it is a violation of the copyright laws to play in any motion-picture theater copyrighted music without the consent of the copyright owners.

The question was then tested in the case of Raymond Hubbell against Royal Pastime Amusement Company before Judge Julius M. Mayer of the United States District Court, Southern District of New York, involving the playing of "Poor Butterfly" in the Regent Theater, a motion-picture house in the Borough of Manhattan, New York City. Judge Mayer in that case sustained the complaint of the composer against the picture house.

The decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Herbert vs. Shanley proceeds upon the theory that the owner of a musical copyright enjoys two distinct rights: First, the right to publish and sell the composition and various arrangements thereof for different instruments; second, to publicly perform it for profit. I believe Congress intended to accord to the creator of the composition a monopoly for twenty-eight years.

The musical entertainment is an integral part of some motion-picture attractions, and in a great many cases the musical program is a distinctive feature of the house.

In the American Society we find such names as Victor Herbert, John Philip Sousa, Raymond Hbbell, Irving Berlin, Jerome D. Kern, Ray Goetz, Ernest Ball, Gus Edwards, Rudolf Frimi, Sylvio Hein, Edgar Leslie, Theodore Morse, Jack Norworth, A. Baldwin Sloane, Puccini, Mascagni, Leoncavallo, and hundreds of others. These men being artists are not difficult to approach or to negotiate with. If we do not blink at the facts and fairly recognize that these composers are daily conceiving and creating melodies which appeal to our public and which we need in our theaters for its entertainment, then why should we not meet these men in a spirit of fairness and concede to them that they have created something we want in our business. Considering the matter in that light, and relying upon the expression of their representatives as to their willingness to meet us half way, would it not be best to meet in conference and adjust our differences?

The American Society has been very active in enforcing the rights of its members, and has proceeded under both the civil and criminal provisions of the law.

Under Section 28 of the Copyright Act it is a misdemeanor, punishable by imprisonment for not exceeding one year, or for a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $1,000, to wilfully and for profit infringe any copyright or to aid or abet such infringement.

More than one hundred civil actions have been brought for the recovery of penalties, provided for by Section 25 of the Copyright Act, against exhibitors. The law provides that the damages recoverable for the infringement of a copyright shall not be less than $250 nor more than $5,000, upon the basis of $10 for every infringing performance in a case of a popular number, and in the case of an operatic composition, $100 for the first and $50 for every subsequent infringing performance. Costs will be allowed in all cases against the infringer, and a counsel fee may be awarded in the discretion of the court.

It has been the policy of this Government to give monopolies to authors and inventors upon the theory that by giving to them a monopoly of their works the progress of science and the useful arts will be promoted. Since phonograph records and rolls were introduced into the market commercially Congress has amended the copyright laws by compelling the manufacturers to pay a royalty to the composers. The tendency has been toward a more complete protection of authors and composers.

No honest lawyer should advise a client to engage in litigation he knows cannot be successful.

Mr. Brandt of Brooklyn, the executive secretary of the M. P. E. L., is now under arrest for copyright violation, and Mr. Ochs, the president of the M. P. E. L., is collecting the $3 per exhibitor. Draw your own conclusions.

The American Exhibitors' Association is willing to meet the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers on behalf of motion-picture exhibitors. We have many differences. We will meet you in an open session. You hear us and we will hear you respectfully and conceding that we both have rights.

BRILANT SELLS "THE ALIBI" TO BRADY.

Arthur M. Brilant, author of "The Alibi," a powerful society drama, has sold the screen rights to his play to the World Film Corporation through William A. Brady, director-general. Alice Brady will play the leading role. At the same time Mr. Brilant is carrying on negotiations with a big firm of legitimate producers for the presentation of "The Alibi" as a three act play on Broadway shortly. Mr. Brilant is at present busy finishing a serial contracted for by a well known firm, and will shortly begin work on a ten reel feature for a state righting organization.

Music Tax—Another Angle.

THE manager for one of our most prominent music publishing firms called my attention to another angle of the "music tax" question, which is decidedly worth serious consideration. He said:

"A person taking out a patent or copyright on an article causes to be stamped or printed on that article the words 'patented' or 'copyrighted.' This is the owner's notice to the public that the article is patented or copyrighted, and no further notice is required by law. The owner of a patented or copyrighted article does not need to go personally to any one and warn him that such-and-such an article is restricted. The copyright owner of a musical composition is not required to give notice that you shall not publicly perform his copyrighted music. The music carries the words 'copyrighted by so-and-so,' and that is all the notice required. He can wait until you have played (or caused to be played) the number a dozen times or a hundred times, and then proceed against you for each separate time—a separate infringement for each performance—and collect from ten dollars upward for each separate count. The law gives him a monopoly on his works and the fruits thereof. The law does not stipulate what price a copyright owner shall charge for a license to use his works. It is his privilege to set any price he sees fit for such license, or he may refuse altogether if he chooses. He may sell it for whatever purpose he wishes, or restrict it in any manner he sees fit, for it is his to do with as he likes.

"Now suppose there were no such organization as the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers. Suppose the composer and author each tried to protect his individual works. They would probably proceed against each infringer whenever it was learned an infringement had occurred. An ordinary mixed musical program might contain anywhere from twelve to fifty infringements in a single evening. The proprietor might have been going along ignorantly making himself liable only to find himself suddenly facing a lawsuit. He could be compelled to pay at least ten dollars for each time a copyrighted piece of music was played without permission. Think what that would mean.

"Now the society has undertaken to furnish a blanket license to cover everything issued by any or all of its members. It undertakes to collect a moderate tax (comparatively) for issuing this license to publicly perform any copyrighted pieces controlled by its members. It has gone to the expense (voluntarily) of printing literature for the purpose of giving information concerning the copyright law, and to explain the position and intentions of the society. Though not required by law to do so, it is explaining, informing and warning possible infringers as to its rights under the law and the penalties for infringement. It is moving slowly so as to give the amusement purveyor every chance to adjust himself to the new order of things. The society is not a cause—it is result. It is not a menace to the purveyor, it is a protection. The theater manager (were it not for the society) would have to address the composer and author of each particular number he wanted to produce, and bargain or arrange terms for permission to produce it. The composer or author (or both) could set any price they saw fit for such permission, and if the number was used without permission they could prefer criminal charges against the offender.

"The society has put everything on a business foundation. All rights and privileges are lumped together and a single payment required. The amusement purveyor knows exactly where he stands, and is fully protected by the society once he secures his license. With the society you have order and system; without the society—chaos. People who are talking about 'breaking up' the society do not realize what they would be up against should they be so unfortunate as to succeed."

(I am making no comment upon the above further than to say that for the best interests of all concerned I want to present all the facts and information I can gather which have a bearing on either side of the question. C. E. S.)

Eight Years Old.

The present copyright law was passed in March, 1909, and went into effect July 1, 1909—eight years ago. That the performance of musical works in public for profit constitutes a sale, was never questioned. Just what was included in the word "for profit" gave the lawyers a chance to argue several years. The United States Supreme Court has decided that hotels, restaurants, cabarets, etc., are purveyors of music for profit just as much as if they charged admission at the door. It was this particular point that was decided upon January 22, 1917. The rest of the law has been in force for eight years, but not enforced. The copyright owners did not care to take any action until the whole question was cleared up in the courts, and they wanted very particularly to include the hotels, restaurants, cafes, and cabarets. So particular was this part of the question that the whole copyright law would have seemed a barren victory unless the cabarets, etc., were included in the list of places "selling musical compositions for profit."

Indeed, one music publisher went so far as to say that in his opinion it was places of this kind which were in great part responsible for the creation of the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers. He said that the very latest music from musical productions—or music from the very latest musical productions, and it was usually given them at these places far in advance of the visit of the production itself. That the composer of an opera (for example) depended upon the royalties from the production for the greater part of his profits. That after the show had finished its "run" in New York and came out on the road, it was found that the music was already old, ancient and moss-grown; made common in the cabarets, and in consequence the show had lost much of its drawing power with a consequent shrinkage in the composer's and author's royalties. Some argument.

The music could not be played in the cabarets and hotels unless the music was put on the market. The composer's music is handled by some one publishing house exclusively. The publisher does not have to hurry and get this music out for fear someone else will get ahead of him. If he wanted for there is nothing to keep him from holding it back until the show had finished its New York run, and then put the music on the market. It would sell just as well, for it would then be up to date instead of behind the times.

Presidential Proclamation.

Non-Taxable Theater Music

Chicago Local M. P. E. L. Completes List of Numbers on Which No Royalties Will Be Demanded.

THE Chicago Local Branch No. 2, of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America has issued the following list of musical numbers on which royalties will not be demanded.

The list is accompanied by the statement that it will be augmented from time to time and that information regarding the music tax or untaxable music may be obtained by addressing Miss Katharine C. Melcher, at the League headquarters, 1416 Masonic Temple, Chicago, who compiled the list.

A footnote adds that many of these publishers are offering special discounts to exhibitors. The Moving Picture World will publish additions to this list from time to time. Theater managers and musicians will find this list a handy reference and should be careful in eliminating copyright numbers from their programs.

Sidney Garrett

A New Power in the Motion Picture Field Has Been Elected President of the Brockliss Concern.

SIDNEY GARRETT, who, at the age of thirty-four finds himself president of the film exporting business of J. Frank Brockliss, Inc., of 729 Seventh Avenue, New York, belongs to the new, the youthful and the aggressive school of film executives, upon whom the industry in this country must rest its hopes of future expansion and success. Born in England, Mr. Garrett had considerable commercial experience in London, and five years ago at Montreal, in Canada, he was identified with several big industrial undertakings.

Sidney Garrett.

Restless, energetic, enterprising and looking for even bigger worlds to conquer, Mr. Garrett, in 1916, went to New York and broke into the film game by buying pictures for foreign markets. About the same time Mr. Brockliss established an American branch of his world-wide film distributing business, and early this spring the two operators joined forces. Mr. Brockliss has since returned to England, leaving Mr. Garrett here as president of the American branch of the great business, of which he is in sole control.

Mr. Garrett has personally handled such big film deals for abroad as "Intolerance," "The Deemster," "The Barrier," "The Mormon Maid," "Billy West Comedies," "For the Freedom of the World" and very many others. He buys pictures for England, France, Italy, the Balkans, China, Japan, for South America—for all the world, outside the United States, that isn't fighting, in fact.

He is a very good judge of the commercial value of motion pictures, and in addition to his position as president of J. Frank Brockliss, Inc., holds several positions as personal representative for foreign buyers.

In considerably less than a year Mr. Garrett, who is very popular with all who meet him, has established himself as a force to be reckoned with in the American film business. With youth and energy and, above all, a flawless integrity as his assets he should rise to a pre-eminent position in the fifth largest industry in America.

Mr. Garrett has large plans for the future, which, when matured, will be made public. He is optimistic in regard to the motion picture business, which, in his opinion, has yet to attract the best commercial and artistic minds in every community. "Good business methods" is his slogan in the picture field. It is the application of them which has led Mr. Garrett to his present success.

VACHEL LINDSAY'S LATEST.

Motion picture enthusiasts who remember Vachel Lindsay's luminous book on The Art of Photoplay will be interested in his newest volume of verse just issued from the press of Macmillan, under the title of "The Chinese Nightingale." The title alludes to the first section of the book which offers the poem of the same title which won the Levinson prize in 1915. Of purely photoplay verse there are but two examples; the well known epitaph to John Bunny and a tribute to Mae Marsh, but his poems on the war are of timely interest, and there is included several examples of his poem-games which may presently lead to poem-plays on the screen that will differ from the old time visualization of well remembered poems. The volume will be read with interest by all who love poetry, and it will appeal with nearly equal force to those who like emotional appeal and sound sense. Lindsay's poetry is written for all people, and not merely for the lovers of poetry, and the current volume lists some of his best known efforts along with new work that presently will become better known.

PATHE CLUB ELECTS OFFICERS.

The annual election of officers of the Pathe Club was held on Saturday, Oct. 13th. J. A. Berst was re-elected president, Paul Brunet, vice-president and J. W. Kyle, secretary. J. Egan was elected treasurer. M. Ramirez Torres, P. A. Parsons, L. E. Franconi and M. W. Davidson were re-elected to the board of governors. A. Gini is the new member to be elected.

The treasurer's report showed the finances of the club to be in an enviable shape with a large surplus in the bank. It is planned to secure a club house within the near future, and a committee was appointed by President Berst to look up desirable quarters.

Non-Taxable Theater Music

Second Instalment of List of Numbers Which Are Free from Royalty Charges.

WE are in receipt of the following additions to the list of musical numbers, published in our issue of November 10, upon which no royalties will be demanded. As stated in that week's issue, additional lists of music free from all tax or performing fees will be published from time to time.

This list was prepared by Miss Catherine C. Melcher, for the Chicago Local Branch, No. 2, M. P. E. L. of A.

We would suggest to all managers and theater musicians that the issues containing these lists be carefully filed for future reference.

THE SEEBURG-SMITH.

The other day I went to see the new Seeburg instrument; the "Seeburg-Smith Unified Organ & Orchestra." That's a long name, but it has to cover a big instrument. Last summer I promised to tell something about this new venture, but thought I would wait until they had a little more time to show me around the factory. But the longer a fellow waits, the less time they have out there. They have orders ahead for the next six months, and will not guarantee delivery inside of that period. In fact, orders are piling up so fast that very soon a six months' delivery will be difficult. They have increased their working force in this department at the Seeburg factory, as fast as workers could be found or trained. It has doubled, and trebled and then some; and the Seeburg-Smith is only half a year old. They haven't got the big instrument on exhibition at the sales rooms yet—(on account of being behind with other work) and so I cannot speak of this one from a personal hearing, but it is described to me as a mammoth church organ in combination with sets of orchestra voiced pipes—a real musical instrument—big, serious and dignified. They cannot install this in your house in a couple of days, nor do they pretend to. But they do undertake to fit your theatre acoustically. They will send an expert to your house to examine its acoustics, and install the organ accordingly. (I should have said "Unified Organ & Orchestra." They're particular about this title.) But anyhow, they do not simply voice a lot of pipes in the shop and send them to you in that condition. The stops are all voiced to a special pressure suitable to the house in which the instrument is installed. Some stops are naturally louder than others and must be brought to a proper balance. Some notes will stand out above others on account of acoustic peculiarities, and these must be corrected. Distributors are placed at advantageous points for the purpose of evenly distributing the tone. Now I don't pretend to understand much about this tone-distributing nor voicing on special pressure, but these points were mentioned as evidencing the thoroughness of the Seeburg methods and his determination that the public shall be made to share in his faith in the Seeburg-Smith Unified Organ & Orchestra.

Mr. Smith (the other part of the hyphen) was an associate of the late Robert Hope-Jones. I am informed that for 22 years Mr. Smith and Mr. Hope-Jones were co-workers and together worked out some of the most progressive innovations in organ building. Mr. Smith is now at the Seeburg factory superintending the construction of these new instruments. Mr. Seeburg has not begun any real campaign of advertising as yet. He says he didn't dare until he had brought up his factory facilities to meet the demand.

THE MUSIC TAX.

Valentine Nebraska asks in regard to above: "Does this mean that none of the popular music which is being played everywhere in moving picture houses can henceforth be played without the manager obtains a license?"

It means just that. Up to the present the society has given warning in each case, so the manager has time to come into the fold. Now I have no authority for saying that the society will continue to give warnings in each case, nor that the manager can safely use copyright music until he receives such warning. That has been the procedure so far and I have been told that it was to be continued.

Another thing which seems to be misunderstood. This tax is levied against the theatre. The manager of the theatre is supposed to be selling this music to the public. It would not do any good nor make any difference should the musician or performer take out a license. They seem to be regarded in the light of salesmen or something like that. At any rate, the musician cannot relieve his manager by taking out a license. The manager must pay his own. The tax is against the house.

WAR SONGS.

In an article called "In the Hindenburg Line" by F. Britten Austin in the Saturday Evening Post, occurs this line: "The song the Germans sung when they marched to war in the brave days of 1914. 'Puppchen! du bist mein' Augen Schatz.'"

This is undoubtedly the same as "Puppchen, du bist mein Augenster" from the musical comedy "Puppchen," popular in Germany some years ago. I mention this as a reminder to musicians to make notes of these little points of information when they come along. They are going to be mighty useful in time to come. We are given to understand that the popular song with "Tommy Atkins" at the beginning of the great war was "Tipperary." Salt down a few copies of these old songs. Maybe some one can tell us the names of other songs used by the soldiers in the contending armies. They are liable to be in demand for the war pictures of the future.

For some time Carl Fischer has been advertising a "Moving Picture Service Department," and undertakes to have the same compile and select fitting music for pictures before the release dates. "On all pictures" the line reads. This is a large promise, but if his staff of experts can even partially fulfill it, they have accomplished something to their credit. You are invited to write to Carl Fischer for full information.

ORPHEUS OVERTURE.

In a previous article I said that many American music publishers claimed copyright ownership for the same compositions, or else to the arrangements to the same. The other day in a music store I looked up a few of the claimants for the above overture, just out of curiosity. It is needless to say that neither the composer nor his heirs have any interest in these claims.

OVERTURE. "Orpheus." (Orpheus in der Unterwelt.) Copyright for orchestra by Walter Jacobs, 1915.

Copyright for band by W. H. Cundy, 1886.

Copyright for orchestra by Carl Fischer, 1892

Copyright for orchestra by Carl Fischer, 1914.

John Church Co. (orchestra). No copyright.

Oliver Ditson (band). No copyright.

And any number of piano arrangements. Now the only thing the publishers could possibly claim copyright ownership is in the arrangements; and these are often so nearly alike that it would keep an expert guessing to distinguish one from the other. Indeed, I have in mind a selection of National Airs issued and copyrighted by one publisher, and a selection of similar airs (containing many of the same melodies but in a different routine), published and copyrighted by another publisher, and the orchestration of the melodies was identical in both publications. The fact that any publisher felt free to publish anything he cared to in the past (any foreign composition, I mean), shows that such unprotected matter was regarded as common property. Some made a bluff at monopoly by registering it as "original arrangements." Others did not take the trouble to copyright at all. There is lots of this old music in the world, and the best some of the publishers can claim ownership in is the "orchestration." And many don't even claim that.

SAM FOX PUB. CO.

In a previous article I mentioned the orchestra folios issued by the Sam Fox Pub. Co., of Cleveland, Ohio. Since then I have received very complete catalogs of music from the above house, and only regret that lack of space forbids a more than general mention. The list embraces both concert and dance music; of the former the publishers say: "Unexcelled for concert, theater, and moving pictures." I know of my own knowledge that the folios are useful in moving picture work. I understand that the Sam Fox Co. is not a member of the society nor are any of his composers.

THE SKY PILOT.

The Buffalo Evening Times, in a review of the Sky Pilot, speaks of the musical accompaniment:

"The background of a little habitation in the foothills of the Rockies affords some especially beautiful scenic effects, while the special music written for the play by Joseph C. Briel, a composer of note, adds to the impressiveness."

Australian Notes

By Thomas S. Imrie.

Sydney, N. S. W., September 25, 1917.

THE head Australian offices of Australian Feature Films, Ltd., in Sydney, distributors here of the Paramount program, were completely burned out early this month. The premises were entirely gutted, absolutely nothing being saved. The stock consisted of many films, including one of the current releases, "The Valentine Girl." In addition to this much advertising and publicity matter valued at £7,000 was burned.

Alec Lorimore, managing director, states that the actual damage will run into about £30,000.

It was announced this week that Union Theaters, Ltd., is taking over the Waddington circuit of picture theaters after the present strike. This is the largest deal of its kind ever transacted in Australia, as the theaters affected comprise five houses, known as the Strand, Grand, Globe, Majestic, and King's Cross. The Union Theaters are the Lyceum, Crystal Palace, Empress, Lyric and Olympia.

Under the new regime, these theaters will screen the features imported by Australasian Films, Ltd. (the film renting branch of Union Theaters, Ltd.), who hold rights for Triangle, World, Thannhouser and Vitagraph productions, as well as English films.

Paramount features, previously screened for first release at the Waddington houses, will now be shown at the Haymarket theater, one of the few independent concerns left.

The industrial strike mentioned in my last letter still continues, and owing to lighting restrictions many suburban houses have had to close.

The strike has extended to the coal miners and gas employes, and as a result all light has been restricted between certain hours. Suburban theaters without private plants have had to finish their entertainment not later than 10.15 p. m., this measure being enforced in order to economize with stocks of coal.

The tramway and rail services have greatly increased during the last two weeks, many strikers having returned to work. This has been beneficial to the Sydney theaters, who once more have full houses at the evening sessions.

Special mention may be made of "The Whip" and "God's Man," which have drawn huge crowds to the city theaters in spite of the strike and few means of traveling. The former has proved one of the biggest film successes of recent months.

In the Equity Court at Sydney this week Australasian Films, Ltd., and Union Theaters, Ltd., applied for an injunction against Cosens Spencer, who they alleged was breaking an agreement by attempting to secure the lease of the Lyceum Theater, Sydney. The plaintiff company declared that by an agreement signed in 1911 Spencer could not enter the picture exhibiting business for a certain number of years, which would not expire for some time, and it was important that a renewal of the lease should be obtained by Union Theaters, Ltd.

After hearing argument, Mr. Justice Harvey dismissed the application. He wished to point out that in adopting the view he had, that would not prevent the plaintiffs from testing the matter on appeal.

Another court case in which a film company was concerned was in the application by the Fox Film Corporation of Australasia, Ltd., to prevent a Sydney signwriter using portraits of picture players appearing under the Fox banner, when advertising productions made by other concerns. The injunction was granted.

A deputation waited on Mr. Hughes, Prime Minister, a few weeks ago. The leaders told him that Australasian Films, Ltd., was trying to prevent the importation of films into Australia, and asked his assistance to prevent so nefarious a design. Mr. Hughes told them that he had not heard anything of this, and said he did not see how it could be done. One of the deputation then said that it could be done by recommending the measure to the Luxuries Board, which is considering prohibiting certain imports. It was stated by one of the leaders of the deputation that the film trust refused to permit the filming of Australian-made pictures. Now they had heard that the combine—which was a very large concern—was trying to bring about the total restriction of the importation of film for two years. It had millions of feet of film in stock to supply its own needs. Mr. Hughes replied: "No representation as far as that is concerned has yet been made to the Luxuries Board, or mooted to me. Here you complain to me that a combine is boycotting Australian films, and now you say it wants to clear the market of all the American product. I can't for the life of me understand how you can justify your position as men who desire to encourage the manufacture of films in Australia when you want unrestricted importations." With this shattering response ringing in their ears, the deputation retired. The whole performance was a farce from beginning to end, and is considered the joke of the season in the film trade here.

Indian Notes

By S. B. Banerjea.

J. F. MADAN has completed the exhibition of "The Broken Coin" and started "Pearl of the Army" at the Elphinstone. His "Pearl" promises to be a success from a box office point of view. He has of late been giving us an all-comic program every Friday. He has exhibited the following films lately: "Sorrows of Satan," "The Submarine Pirate," "The Ward," etc.

At the Royal Opera House "The Sign of the Poppy" and "Fighting for Love" have been exhibited with success.

The Theater Royal does not go in for long serials. It gives two changes weekly. We always have one or more two or three reel films, mostly of American manufacture.

The Picture House, I must confess, has not of late been giving us satisfaction. I do not know who selects films for this theater, but I would ask its proprietors to give us something of the kind which we expect and get from J. F. Madan, and not what their advisers would like us to see. They can choose from the productions of the Universal and other well-known manufacturers.

A well-known bioscope proprietor specializes in the productions of a celebrated manufacturer. I do not name any of them now for obvious reasons. All the productions of this manufacturer are not good. Some of them are dismal failures. Well, from the box office point of view, it is not at all advisable to stick to the productions of one house. I have heard regular bioscopers loudly complaining against the foisting of films manufactured by the house referred to as they were no good at all, and demanding a better class of films.

Will C. Smith is Promoted

Popular Projection Engineering Expert Elected General Manager of the Nicholas Power Company.

WILL C. SMITH is now general manager of the Nicholas Power Company. He succeeds the late John Francis Skerrett, whose death was announced last week. Mr. Smith for a long time has been assistant general manager of the Power company, and during the illness of Mr. Skerrett had so successfully filled the position of that efficient man of many friends that his selection as general manager was the expected thing.

Mr. Smith brings to his position a ripe experience, not only on the mechanical but also on the business side. With the host of exhibitors and supply men with whom he daily comes in contact he is able to talk knowingly on trade topics other than the immediate subject of projection. He is by reason of his many years on the road and his close connection with motion picture shows in a position intelligently to advise with his customers as to the problems which face them.

Will C. Smith.

It was twenty years ago Mr. Smith began working with motion pictures. He was one of the originators of illustrated songs in connection with pictures and was for some time in the road show business. He conducted a supply house, selling projection machines, and also in connection with this business a film exchange. He took care of the projection end of the Fred Niblo lectures and the pictures of Ernest Shackleton, the Antarctic explorer. Also he was with Lyman Howe.

Five years ago Mr. Smith joined the Nicholas Power company. In that time he has made many close friends among motion picture men. He has supervised a great many of the big installations in New York, the projection arrangements for many of the larger pictures that were to be exploited in prominent theaters. In May, 1915, Mr. Smith established a record for long-distance projection when he installed two cameragraphs in Madison Square Garden and obtained a perfect picture 34 feet wide at a throw of 300 feet.

One of Mr. Smith's achievements since he has been with the Power company was the compilation of a booklet, "Hints to Operators," in which for the benefit of the men who contribute so much to the success of any show he set forth much helpful advice, giving them the benefit of his experience as a projection engineer and general all-around expert. Several editions of this publication were exhausted.

The new general manager of the Power company is an indefatigable worker. His energies are not restricted to his business life, but are given to the social organizations with which he is connected. If you want an accurate estimate of Mr. Smith's worth on this side of his activities ask any member of the Screen Club, of which organization the projection expert has been treasurer for a year and is just now starting on his second term. They will tell you at the Screener's' home that his work for them during the past year has been of the invaluable description. The club register shows that he was "on the job" 340 of the 365 days of his first twelvemonth. Mr. Smith also is treasurer of the National Society of Projection Engineers and is a member of the Machinery Club of New York and the Green Room Club.

LOUISVILLE EXHIBITORS FIGHT MUSIC TAX.

The members of the Photoplay Association of Louisville, Ky., have decided that they will not pay the music tax or royalty payments of the Society of American Authors, Composers and Publishers, and all music controlled by that organization has been thrown out of the Louisville theaters for the present. A meeting is to be held shortly at which resolutions will be adopted relative to paying a royalty tax assessed on the seating capacity of the various theaters. Local exhibitors feel that so many different taxes and costs are being unloaded through the exhibitors on to the shoulders of their patrons that business will suffer materially if something isn't done to relieve the situation. Although prices have been raised for admission, it is said that further raises will have to be made if additional increases in cost of operating theaters are posted.

WE ACKNOWLEDGE THE COURTESY.

In the article, "You Can't Go Wrong," by Sam Spedon, on the collection of the admission tax we overlooked giving credit to the Automatic Ticket and Cash Register Company for furnishing the tickets which illustrated that article. It was published in the issue of November 17.

Miss Clark Not to Leave Paramount.

The announcement in newspapers recently that Marguerite Clark, dainty star of Paramount pictures, would shortly leave the screen to appear in a musical comedy, was emphatically denied this week by Miss Clark, who stated she would continue in Paramount Pictures indefinitely.

COMPOSERS AND AUTHORS.

Here is a list of American composers and authors belonging to the Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers. Some members have withdrawn since the society was formed, and these names I have omitted so far as I know them. Others have come in since the society was organized, and these I have included so far as I know them. It is not likely that any list of names nor of music can be expected to remain permanently either IN or OUT of the society. However, such as it is here is a list corrected up to date so far as I am able to get it. There may be further changes by the time this appears:

- Abrahams (Maurice), Felix Arndt, Harold Atteridge.

A BOOSTER.

Mr. James O'Neill, who says his business keeps him traveling New York and Winnipeg and that he is an ardent picture fan as well as a musical one, writes:

"I was in the 'Star Theater' in Kitchener (Ontario, Canada), and was struck by the excellence of the music they had there. The picture was Mary Pickford in 'Romance of Redwoods,' and I was surprised to hear such good music in so small a town. The pianist was operating a combined organ and piano and his efforts were worthy of a first-class house in a larger city. Now I made it my business to see him, and asked him how he could manage to play so exactly and he showed me some spare ideas of music and said he got his ideas from Clarence E. Sinn's page in the Moving Picture World. He is an Englishman, a clever musician and deserves much credit for his performances, I think, so I thought I would write you about him, and ask you to mention his good work. I am sure he would appreciate it."

Now, friend O'Neill, how could I help using your letter when the subject of it speaks so delightfully about my page in the Moving Picture World?

I cannot speak from any recent experience, but I have been led to believe that good music is no real novelty in small towns. Mr. O'Neill's experience seems to indicate that it is a rarity. Whichever way it is, one fact stands out:

the small town musician seldom if ever gets any credit for his (or her) good work, while the city musician receives a bit of printed applause occasionally. And this goes for the small town exhibitor, too. I am glad to take Mr. O'Neill's word for it that the young man deserves a boost, and will add that the manager also is to be included. He is evidently a showman who knows what he wants and gets it even though he has to import it. I'll bet a dollar the operator showed the picture the way it should be put on, too.

THE CINEMA MUSIC COMPANY.

I wish to acknowledge the receipt of violin parts of some moving picture music issued by the above named firm. Judging from the parts sent me I should say their music is attractive as well as useful. It is called "cinema incidental music," is printed on one side of separate sheets (loose leaf style), and the playing time of each is indicated at the top of the page. For example, No. 1 is a dramatic theme and is divided into five numbered sections; that is, each strain is numbered. At the top of the page is the announcement:

From 1 to 2.....	40 seconds.
" 2 to 3.....	19 "
" 3 to 4.....	40 "
" 4 to 5.....	42 "
Coda	30 "

Total 4 minutes, 10 seconds.

No. 2 (A Pathetic Andante) is divided into four numbered strains and the playing time is given as 3 min. 25 sec.

The firm announces that three more numbers are now in press, viz:

- "Dramatic Recitative".....By Sol. P. Levy
- "Dramatic Agitato".....By Henry Hough
- "Heavy Mysterioso".....By Sol. P. Levy

I am requested to say that this music is not subject to any music tax.

REMICK DROPS OUT.

The following printed statement is being circulated among the members of the American Federation of Musicians:

MUSICIANS TAKE NOTICE.

November 27, 1917.

The undersigned beg to announce that they have tendered their resignation to the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers, and that all our publications are free from tax wherever played.

JEROME H. REMICK & CO.

CAREY WILSON JOINS FIRST NATIONAL.

Carey Wilson, one of the best-known figures in the New York film sales field, last week assumed the management of the First National Exchange, the New York distributing offices for the First National Exhibitors' Circuit. Mr. Wilson resigned from the Fox Film Corporation some two weeks ago.

Mr. Wilson's active film experience began as an exhibitor eight years ago, from which field he joined William Sherry when the latter opened the New York Exchange for releasing the first Famous Players film, "The Prisoner of Zenda." This association continued until three years ago, when he joined the Fox organization for the purpose of installing the contract system of bookings throughout the United States. In this task he acquired active experience in every exchange city of the country. Shortly after he opened the Canadian offices for Fox and left Canada on two days' notice to go to Australia and New Zealand. During 1916 Mr. Wilson covered over fifty thousand miles of territory, opening the Fox offices in Sydney, Melbourne and Adelaide (Australia) and Wellington, N. Z. It was at this time he renewed his acquaintance with J. D. Williams, manager of the First National circuit.

Returning to America, Mr. Wilson's first task was the metropolitan booking office for "The Honor System."

Mr. Wilson's association with the First National Exchange is expressed in his own words as follows: "We have the one universal attraction in the industry, Chaplin, and lined up with him we have pictures such as 'Empty Pockets.' The men at the head of this organization are men with big ideas—and big plans for carrying out the ideas."

Mr. Wilson is situated at the newly established First National Exchange, at 509 Fifth Avenue, where has been prepared one of the finest and best equipped exchanges in the city.

Madge Kennedy

FEW actresses lay claim to the number and variety of talents that have been developed by Madge Kennedy, one of the ablest of American comediennes, who has but recently added to her list of accomplishments her appearance in Goldwyn Pictures.

Miss Kennedy will always be remembered as the comedienne who made America laugh in a series of comedy successes. This was not because she lacked other talents, but because the others were subordinated to the one that made her famous.

Madge Kennedy.

But first of all Miss Kennedy was and still is a painter of such ability that had she not taken up a career on the stage through chance she might have been widely known as an artist.

Miss Kennedy also is a capable cartoonist. Her rare sense of humor has generated many comic creations, some of which have been published, and which have attracted the attention of noted comic artists. Only recently, while busy with her first screen production, the little comedienne created a new idea in comics, which was praised by Harrison Fisher, who expressed the opinion that the new idea would meet with great success. Shortly before that Miss Kennedy painted a patriotic poster.

Miss Kennedy's earliest ambition was to be a painter, and she still hopes to make a name for herself in that field. Leaving her home in California while she was yet a young girl, she went to New York, where she joined the Art Students' League. Her work attracted considerable attention, and she was making rapid progress when the turn of fate changed the course for her career.

She had gone to a camp in Maine with other art students, where there was also a group of actors. Some theatrical performances were given for the party's amusement. Miss Kennedy took part in some of them. Henry Woodruff applauded her one day, and she asked him for a chance. He gave it to her in "The Genius."

The fortunes of the stage soon brought Miss Kennedy to Cleveland—out of work—where she joined the Colonial Stock Company.

That was six years ago. Two years in the stock company prepared the comedienne for the opportunity she had waited for. She was offered a part in "Over Night," the first comedy in which she ever had an important role.

From that time her success was assured. Her rise in the last four years is familiar to most theatergoers. It was accomplished with such successes as "Little Miss Brown," "Twin Beds," "Fair and Warmer." Now, in turning to the screen, she has been seen in another of Margaret Mayo's great stage successes, "Baby Mine," and in Edgar Selwyn's comedy-drama, "Nearly Married."

AND THE GAME WENT RIGHT ON.

In the making of the new William Fox photoplay, "The Kingdom of Love," one of the most important scenes is laid in a dance hall in the Klondike. Director Frank Lloyd thought he had put on the last touch of realism when he had a real bar and a real dancing floor and real card tables. But even then he was to be taught that these things sometimes can be made truer than they seem. It happened that on the corner of a stage was a group of men who often played cards together.

"Those men over there are acting splendidly," said the director. "Let us get them in the picture."

So the cameraman went over and took the men playing. "That is all," said the director when he had what he wanted. "I am through. You men can stop."

"But the scene is not through," answered one of the men, without looking up. Then to the other players he said with a satisfied expression:

"I'll play these."

Grants Performing Rights With the Music How a Prominent Publisher Stands on the Music Tax Controversy.

AS a matter of information to those exhibitors who are in doubt as to their rights in regard to the use of music composed by members of the American Society of Authors, Composers and Publishers when such music is offered tax free by publishers holding copyright on it, we publish below a communication just received from G. Schirmer (Inc.). The communication is comprehensive and self-explanatory.

December 20, 1917.

Moving Picture World,
New York City.

Gentlemen: We do not in the least hesitate to explain to you our attitude in the matter of meeting the demands of the American Society of Authors, Composers and Publishers with reference to its exacting fees for the right of publicity performing musical compositions. Fully cognizant of the fact that, by virtue of the decision of Supreme Court Justice Hand, the society is within its rights in exacting performing fees for works under its jurisdiction either in relating to author, composer or publisher, we nevertheless, not being members of the society, are free to follow our own views and intuitions. For reasons too numerous to account, we deem it wiser to grant free license to the performance of any of our publications. This policy we have purchased from the start and it is our intention to continue it. Through our action we do not renounce sole proprietorship of our rights to dispose of performing privileges. We maintain, on the other hand, that we grant performing rights with the purchase of the music.

The question that seems to have caused most anxiety among musicians is whether compositions by an author, a member of the society, and published by a firm, a non-member of the society, may be considered exempt from taxation. On this point our views and those of the society conflict. Under the Copyright Law the performing rights belong to the publisher and not to the composer except when the latter has specifically reserved them for himself. There are few instances on record when a composer has done so. In our own immense catalog of publications we have but one or two exemptions. These we withdraw from the classification of non-taxable music. The balance of our publications we consider absolutely within our own control, irrespective of the fact that composers or authors may be members of the society.

What we have said so far covers the situation in a general way, but speaking of it in even a stricter sense, we do not hesitate to say further that it is our opinion, and which opinion is supported by legal counsel, that all music is practically free to be played in public which was published at least one day prior to the date when the first legal action was begun, which eventually led to the handing down of the decision by Supreme Court Justice Hand, thus establishing a foundation for the recognition of the demands of the society.

Yours very truly,
G. SCHIRMER (INC).
D. Kamb.

Abrams Visits Old Home Town

Paramount Official Tells Former Neighbors Government Expects to Get $280,000,000 from Screen This Year.

HIRAM ABRAMS, of Paramount, visited Portland last week at the psychological moment when the Chamber of Commerce was agitating the plan of closing the theaters on account of the coal shortage. Mr. Abrams didn't want to butt into local affairs, and preferred not to make any comment on the situation, but he did remark that he didn't believe the United States could well afford to close the theatres on account of the tremendous revenue received from this source.

This brought out some of the astounding facts and figures in regard to the money paid into the Federal Treasury by moving picture houses throughout the country.

"The United States Government expects to clear $280,000,000 revenue from the moving picture interest this year," said Mr. Abrams. "There is three-fourths of a cent war tax on every foot of film used in this country for the making of photo plays. The Eastman Kodak company, which manufactures this film, collects it on their bill for the raw material to the producers. The Paramount company alone pays the Government $15,000 a week in war tax on the film it uses."

"I am not joking when I say that the movies will help to win the war," continued Mr. Abrams. "It is the constant argument of all the people who are working for the betterment and high standard of morale for our soldiers that the men in the trenches must have amusement and recreation. There is no doubt that the most popular form of amusement among the boys is the moving picture. It is the form of amusement that includes good humor, and optimistic spirit in the men, which means high morale. The movies more than any other thing divert the minds of soldiers from their depressing environment."

In speaking of the moving pictures as connected with the world war, Mr. Abrams incidentally remarked that the United States has taken over the moving picture business of the Allies and is even now making official films for Great Britain. Three manufacturers in America already have been appointed by the Federal Government for motion picture work.

Asked whether many of the screen stars had been drafted for the army service Mr. Abrams replied in the negative, and this inspired another comment: "It would be really a mistake to take such men as 'Fatty' Arbuckle and Charlie Chaplin for the trenches," he observed. "Both these men can do much more good just where they are. They would be ordinary men in fighting the Germans, no better than thousands of others who would be drafted right beside them, but as movie actors these two comedians amuse thousands of soldiers in the pictures shown both on this side and at the war front, and as I have said about the moving picture in general are part of the scheme of diversion that helps maintain the morale of the fighters in the trenches."

Mr. Abrams told of his first plunge into the theatrical and moving picture business. "I was working in the Steinert music store on Congress street about eight years ago," he said, "when I got my first peek into the business that has since developed into such a monster industry. At that time the illustrated song was the rage of the vaudeville stage. The Steinert company secured scores of these slides for songs, and leased them to local theaters for $5 each. This set me to thinking. I knew these slides didn't cost but a very small amount to make. I went to New York one day and purchased 500 of them at $2 each. Then I returned and began to lease them to theaters myself. My first illustrated song slides were shown in the old Portland theater, and this was my start in the moving picture business."

Mr. Abrams did not jump directly from his illustrated song venture into the photoplay business, however. His second venture was as owner or part owner of a chain of theaters throughout the New England States and finally the old Portland theater was torn down to make room for the present Fidelity building, and the New Portland theater was built for Mr. Abrams and his partner, Mr. Greene.

Mr. Abrams soon established a big business throughout Northern New England as agent and promoter of films. Two years ago he was elected president of Paramount.

Walsh Talks About Casting

New Fox Director Says There Must Be Acting Ability as Well as Fidelity to Type.

ABSOLUTE accuracy in casting," said R. A. Walsh, newest of Goldwyn directors, when asked to define the forces which enter into his film productions. "I do not choose players only for their fidelity to the part as I see it, but for their ability to project the character as I know it." The success of Walsh as a director both powerful and subtle can easily be traced to this element in his work—that of using actors who can not only look the part, but act it.

"It is not easy to discover the combination, but with patience it can be done. Too often I have interviewed candidates for a part—scores of them for the same role—and found no lack of perfect types. Rarely, however, do I succeed in finding at first hand the player who acts as well, even though each applicant assures me that such gifts are his.

"And with experience in picking the right people a director acquires a certain psychic quality. This enables him to sense the acting ability of an applicant even before he sees it. It eliminates costly, time-wasting tests and tryouts. He can interview the greatest number of people in the shortest time and altogether the process is made an agreeable one.

"It is not always possible, of course, to spend the time necessary to bring out this latent ability to act. The demands on a director are many and pressing. He cannot afford, except in rare cases, to give a novice first lessons in acting; he must have a groundwork of experience, just as an artist must have his certain colors, to work with. Then the director can build up the character as he understands it."

PROGRESS MAKING ON EXPOSITION.

Various exhibitors' organizations connected with the motion picture industry and their locals in a number of cities in eastern states plan to convene at the Motion Picture Exposition in Grand Central Palace during the week of February 2 to 10, which will be held under the auspices of the National Association of the Motion Picture Industry and the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League. Associations in the States of New York, New Jersey and all of the New England States will be represented, while those west of New York will be represented to no small degree.

Despite the usual holiday rush in the motion picture industry considerable progress has been made during the past week in securing new exhibitors for the exposition. Eleven more concerns were added to the already large lists of exhibitors who have contracted for space and many more will be closed by January 1, as many of the communications addressed to Manager Frederick H. Elliott state.

GARFIELD SAYS LIGHTLESS NIGHTS SAVE COAL.

United States Fuel Administrator Harry A. Garfield, testifying before the Senate subcommittee of the committee on manufactures, last week stated that the order for limitation of electric signs and all outdoor lighting made effective for two nights in the week (Thursdays and Sundays) should save between 150,000 and 200,000 tons of coal. There is a shortage this year of about 50,000,000 tons of bituminous coal, additional to which there is a shortage in anthracite coal. The former is required very largely by munitions plants and factories; the latter is used by the householders and by some of the public utilities.

Seltzer Reports Business Good.

Charles Seltzer, head of the Seltzer Music Company of Pittsburgh, Pa., states that the closing month of last year was the biggest in the history of his business. Seeburg pipe organ orchestras were sold and installed in the following houses during the past four weeks: Family, Braddock; Princess, Republic; Anchor, Diamond street, Pittsburgh; Comet, Beaver Falls; Paramount, Latrobe; Frederick, East Pittsburgh; Photoplay, Monaca; Barnes, Elwood City; Lyric, McKees Rocks; James Pizzola, Clairton; S. L. Woodward, Charleroi; Grand, McKees Rocks. This is some showing and indicates that the exhibitors are anticipating a revolt in business, even if things are a little slow at the present time.

Music for the Picture

Conducted by GEORGE W. BEYNON.

Beynon to Edit Music Department

New Moving Picture World Contributor Has Had Long and Wide Experience in the Musical Field.

BEGINNING with this issue of the Moving Picture World (February 2) the Music Department will be conducted by George W. Beynon. Mr. Beynon is a musician of wide experience and marked skill. He has made a deep study of photoplay requirements, of the demands of the management of theatres and of the desires of the public.

Mr. Beynon was born in Canada, but later became a citizen of the United States. He was graduated in Arts from the University of Toronto. Under the tutition of Dr. Anger, an authority on harmony and theory and author of many text books, he spent four years in the Toronto Conservatory of Music. In Leipsic, Germany, he was given the Mus. Doc. degree.

Much time has been given by Mr. Beynon to orchestral and band arranging. He has synchronized many operas to tableau form, which have been used extensively. As an arranger his experience has covered songs, classic and popular music, vaudeville acts and grand opera selections.

Mr. Beynon spent some years as a professional singer. He has a deep bass voice and filled concert and recital dates all over the country. He led choirs and bands, and later entered the orchestral field, where he has remained. In

George W. Beynon.

September, 1915, Mr. Beynon was engaged by Oliver Morosco to assemble and synchronize music for "Peer Gynt." The first playing of the arrangement was at the Broadway Theater by an orchestra of thirty pieces.

As a result of this work Mr. Beynon was engaged to write a score for all of the Pallas and Morosco productions and later secured a contract with the Famous Players and Lasky companies. His schedule called for the arrangement of a score every three days. A total of 162 were written. Exhibitors praised Mr. Beynon's work, and it is said that many found the way paved for the enlargement of their orchestras and the increasing of their prices of admission.

Mr. Beynon has been retained by some of the large film companies to take charge of their musical service. Also he has found time to direct the musical programs of several theatres.

On January 27, at the presentation at the Lyric Theater of "Lest We Forget," Mr. Beynon personally will direct an orchestra of thirty pieces.

Proper Presentation of Pictures Musically.

MUSIC for the picture is here to stay. The screen action, watched in silence has not the wonderful effect that is obtained by the use of a musical setting which holds the atmosphere and interprets the dominant emotion. The musical accompaniment to a song is always subservient to, and in perfect tempo with, the singer. It rises and falls with the voice, breathing softly in the pianissimo passages and crashing loudly in forte moments, yet never dominating the situation, nor predominating over the voice. It supports and carries the singer. This principle applies exactly to music for the photoplay. Let your music support the action and carry the atmosphere of the feature.

In this day of symphony orchestras of thirty or forty men, music values have been distorted beyond all proportion. Some of our biggest theaters have become a bedlam of noise, and the idea prevails that each scene must be interpreted musically, to the extreme. We are carried back to the Biblical days when the "sounding of brass and crashing of cymbals" was music to the ears of the populace; when songs were loudly shouted and the "trumpets blared" out their motifs. Surely we cannot blame the photoplay for this retrogradation, but the fact remains that many orchestras do not accompany the picture, but play over it.

A scene depicting the grief of an aged mother is shown and the orchestra immediately begins "Asa's Tod" by Grieg, when "One Who Has Yearned Alone" (Tschaikowsky), "A Keltic Lament" (Foulds) or Lamento (Gabriel-Marie) would be more reasonable. When they must fit a real anguishing death scene, they have used their loudest thunder and the scene becomes less impressive by contrast. Why use Il Guarany Overture for a picayune fight when one may need it for a terrific battle scene, or La Chevaux from La Valkyrie for horsemen riding, when it may be used for the stirring onslaught of rushing cavalry charges. The many beautiful selections, specially arranged for strings alone, are seldom, if ever, used in large orchestras. Yet they are most effective, easily procured, and provide a charming change of color, that soothes the ear. It is a grave mistake to use dynamic numbers that overshadow the scene depicted. Each selection sticks out like a sore thumb and the attention of the patrons is detracted from the picture entirely. Losing for the moment the thread of the plot, they sit back and listen to the concert.

Many leaders try to fit every passing scene or "flash back" and provide a choppy, meaningless melange that irritates the audience. Each scene or series of scenes always has a predominant thought or motif behind the action shown. It is the thought which should be portrayed, and if a "flash back" occurs it does not signify a change in the dominant emotion. Thus the music should continue until a complete change is established. For example, a father is dying and longing for his only son. We are shown in a "flash" the dissipated son, drinking in a saloon. This lasts for 15 seconds and returns to the death bed scene. Sorrow is the dominant emotion and to change to a fox-trot for the "flash" would disrupt the continuity of the scene. The father dies, the family slowly leave the room with the doctor, and we are then shown an exterior of the home of the hero. This is the point to change the music to a lighter vein in keeping with what follows. There may be a series of scenes containing the same feeling, but distinctly separate and remote from the standpoint of action. In this instance there need be no change in the music to fit each scene; for, by using a long selection which portrays the prevalent thought, you get a smooth and true presentation. Cowbells, sand blocks, wind machines and traps of all descriptions are frequently brought in at every possible excuse. In fact, a drummer is sometimes judged by his agility in handling, one after the other, every contraption around him. Legitimate "effects" have their place in re-enforcing the disturbances depicted on the screen, but when used continually become meaningless and a nuisance.

The fallacy lies in the fact that musical director tries to get as many big musical moments as possible into every film. The consequence is, that, taking the music in its entirety, you get the idea of a series of mountains and valleys, the latter being the incidental or neutral numbers (selected to give the orchestra a little rest) which, by contrast, become more drab and meaningless. The photoplay, as the name indicates, is a play given upon the screen, and all the varied scenes and situations gradually lead to a climax. This may come at the finish of the picture, just before the end, or in the middle. Music should be selected with this point kept in view. The climax of the picture should be the climax of your music, though subservient to, and always below, the action. At no time should music predominate or stand out from the scenes shown. The entire setting should be graded up to the climax and down to the anti-climax. There are many examples of big scenes that would be accepted as the climax if the orchestra were not careful in its playing for them. Music must keep pace with the progressive strides of the picture industry. The time has passed when a job-lot of music can be dumped into the orchestra pit to be played for the picture. Music must fit each prevailing emotion (not dominate it), in tempo and character, and also in sequence with the preceding number, with due regard for what is to follow. Key sequence is necessary, to obviate abrupt discords in changing from one number to the next and to consolidate the many selections into a comprehensible whole. The entire musical setting should be built up and welded together; a perfect accompaniment to the picture, unheard by the audience but felt.

Leaders Service Bureau.

Questions Answered—Suggestions Offered.

Q. "Can music be procured for a saxophone quintet in sufficient quantities to use for pictures?"

A. "No. There is little if any music written solely for saxophones, but if you wish to introduce the instruments into your orchestra, the baritone saxophone readily plays from a cello part, the alto from a clarinet part transposed and the soprano from the violin part. As an innovation we imagine it would be immense, but might become too 'jazzy' as a regular thing."

Q. "What is the best instrumentation of a seven-piece orchestra for a small theater playing pictures?"

A. "Piano, Harmonium, two Violins, Flute, Clarinet and Cello."

Q. "Do you believe in changing the traditional tempo of a number to suit the scene?"

A. "Generally speaking, no—but if the scene is interrupted by a 'flash back' of a few seconds the music might be retarded or hastened to fit the flash, returning to the original tempo to complete the scene."

Q. "Can I get a list of music that can be played free?"

A. "We refer you to our printed lists in the issues of November 10, November 24, December 1, December 29, January 12 and January 26. If you cannot readily procure these we will be pleased to send you a copy of them upon your request."

Q. "I am anxious to study Harmony. What are the best text books to use?"

A. "The best is a matter of opinion. We would suggest 'Harmony,' by Prout, 'Harmony and Theory,' by Richter, 'First Rudiments of Harmony,' by Anger."

Musical Suggestion Synopsis.

ROSE OF THE WORLD (Arterraft)—Theme for the Heroine—Andante. Suggest "Arabian Nights," Mildenberg, or "Will I Wake?" Wolforde-Finden.

The first two reels take place in India and require Oriental music. The third and fourth bring the action in England. Use pathetic stuff. During the last reel introduce some Oriental selections. Finish with the Theme. Cue sheet can be obtained from Artercraft Exchange.

MRS. DANE'S DEFENSE (Paramount)—Theme for the Heroine, Andantino. Suggest "Premier D'Amour," Benoist, "Consolation," Liezt, or "Extase D'Amour," Roze.

The play is dramatically heavy and requires big stuff except in the second and third reels where Allegrettos, Waltz-Intermezzos and Moderatos can be used. Cue sheet can be obtained from Paramount Exchange.

HIS MOTHER'S BOY (Paramount)—Theme for Ray, One-Step. Suggest "Send Me a Curl," O'Hara, or "Cutey," Motzan.

The picture is comedy and needs light treatment. Watch for big first fight and mob scene. No cue sheet available.

THE PRICE OF FOLLY (Pathe)—Theme for the Heroine, Andante. Suggest "Elysium," Speaks, or "Eventide," Schytte.

This is melodrama throughout, and the first and second movements of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony would cover it splendidly. Cue sheet at Pathe Exchange.

STOLEN HONOR (Fox)—Theme for Heroine, Moderato. Suggest "Chiffonette," Atherton, "Eleanor," Deppen, or "Serenade," Widor. Use melodramatic music, a few misteriosos, a march or two, and some dramatic stuff. Cue sheet can be obtained from Fox Exchange.

THE WILD STRAIN (Greater Vitagraph)—Theme for the Heroine, Waltz-Intermezzo. Suggest "Spring-Time," Drumm, or "Petite Bijouterie," Bohm.

The first two reels dequire only Moderatos, Allegrettos and Allegros. Use "A Day with the Circus," Lampe, or "The County Fair," Armand, for the circus scenes. Note the big fist fight and use a long hurry. Cue sheet can be obtained from Vitagraph Exchange.

THE BEAUTIFUL MRS. REYNOLDS (World)—Theme for the heroine, Valse Lente. Suggest "Destiny Waltz," Baynes, or "Innamorata," Marchetti. Use a medley of old songs if possible, such as "Seeing Nelling Home," "Old Oaken Bucket," etc., to open the picture.

The action takes place in 1777, so naturally no new or popular numbers should be used. Old English and a touch of Southern airs would fit admirably. Cue sheet can be obtained from World Exchange.

MEN WHO HAVE MADE LOVE TO ME (Essanay)—Theme for the Heroine, Andantino. Suggest "Consolation," Liszt, "Au Matin," Godard, or "Longing," Florida.

This deals in six episodes of love. Use the theme at the conclusion of each. Note the fight in the restaurant scene of the third reel, and the Chinese atmosphere almost immediately following. Light music will do except in a couple of sad scenes. In the last reel there is a chance for big dramatic stuff, where a man breaks into Mary's room. Cue sheet can be obtained from Kleine Exchange.

IN BAD (Mutual-American)—Theme, none.

This is a comedy of slapstick variety. One-steps, fox trots or light opera selections will do nicely. No cue sheet available.

NO MONEY, NO FUN (Sunshine)—Theme, none.

Another comedy of the usual variety. Light jazzy music is needed. No cue sheet available.

THE FLAMES OF CHANCE (Triangle)—Theme for the Heroine, Andantino. Suggest "Longing," Florida, or "Melodie," Lederer.

There will be need of a few Battle Hurries, a Misterioso and some dramatic numbers. The French atmosphere should be fitted with music by Massenet, Debussy or Berlioz. Cue sheet can be obtained from Triangle Exchange.

EVIDENCE (Triangle)—Theme for the Heroine, Lento. Suggest "Yes-ter-thoughts," Herbert, or "On Wings of Love," Bendix.

This is a heavy drama, filled with mystery. Such number as "En Mer," Holmes, "Prelude," Rachmaninoff, "Preludes," Chopin, and music of this order will fit the situations. Have on hand a few one-steps and waltzes for lighter moments and a march suitable for the wedding scene. Cue sheet can be obtained from Triangle Exchange.

THE BRIDE (Edison)—Theme, none.

This is a one-reel comedy and we would suggest that some of the light opera selections be used throughout—"Alle, Modiste," Herbert, "Maid in America," Romberg, or "When Dreams Come True," Hein. No cue sheet available.

JULES OF THE STRONG HEART (Paramount)—Theme for the Heroine, Moderato. Suggest "On the Banks of the Saskatchewan," Caryl, "At the Hamlet," Godard, or "Jacqueline," Behr.

This is a story of the Canadian woods. It needs many pastoral numbers typically French. It is filled with pathos, requiring andantino or andante subjects. Not the storm, riot and fight scenes. The following numbers can be used advantageously throughout the setting: "Prelude and Romance," Reinecke, "Meditation," Williams, "Mountain Music," Borch, or "Indian Summer," Lake. Cue sheet can be obtained from Paramount Exchange.

THE KITCHEN LADY (Paramount)—Theme for the Heroine, Allegro. Suggest "Candy Land," from Jack o' Lantern, Caryl, "Kiss Me Again," Herbert, or "Miracle of Love," McKee.

A comedy dealing in animal antics. The usual two-steps and light music will fit excellently. No cue sheet available.

Music at the Strand.

In the week of January 6 the Strand Symphony Orchestra, composed of fifty musicians, rendered Rhapsody Estana Overture by Chabrier under the baton of Mr. Spirescu. Mile. Zentay played "Mazurka," by Zaryzski, in her usual good form. Manager Edel staged "The Mikado" in tabloid form, and Carl Edouarde led the orchestra through the intricacies of the music for the feature.

A few points in the setting of the picture are worthy of particular notice.

During a sad scene Massenet's "Bois Sacre" for flute solo was introduced and proved most effective. We usually associate the interpretation of pathos with the violoncello, but the exceptional execution of the low tones of the flute would bring tears to a stone. Another example of novelty occurred, when a French liner was seen about to leave port. A band was indistinctly heard playing "The French National Defile March." We were positive that the music came from the ship's saloon, but as a matter of fact the trick was done by placing the brass and wood-wind sections of the orchestra "back stage." It was duly appreciated and drew considerable applause. These legitimate "effects" are what makes the difference in the caliber of a performance.

Mr. Harold Edel has done good work in his novel treatment of "The Mikado." There is an abridgement of the popular Operetta by Gilbert and Sullivan, done in cycle form, with stage settings and in costume. The better known solos, duets, trios and quartettes are strung together in such a manner that the story is well and concisely told. The acting was clever, the lighting exceptionally good, while the singing of Mr. Aldridge and Miss Horgan showed years of familiarity with their roles. The whole tabloid was bright, well enunciated, and took only twenty minutes.

So long as Mr. Edel does not allow his music to crowd out the picture interest it will give to his show a decidedly artistic touch that should find appreciation.

Music for the Picture

Conducted by GEORGE W. BEYNON.

Proper Presentation of Pictures Musically. Fitting the Feature.

ENUNCIATION—Resolved that if directing braios, a large library, and fine orchestra create good music, a picture can be properly presented by the use of same.

HYPOTHESIS—Let the picture be viewed.

SOLUTION—With paper before you, a stop-watch at hand, you see the picture screened. Your first cue for music will be "At Screening." Note the hour you begin viewing. Set the stop-watch. The characters are introduced and the play begins. Your first selection should be left blank. As the scenes change you note cues and the time for each. Memoranda are made according to your individual methods and you will probably make a note of the kind of scene, and indicate the tempo of the music necessary. Possibly a definite selection comes to your mind, and you put it down for the time being. Thus you proceed throughout the entire picture, arranging the changes of music, tentatively fitting the theme and classifying each scene according to its predominant thought. You time each change. Catch the hour when your picture is finished and you know the aggregate time of screening. You already have the time of each scene. If the picture has been projected faster than the usual speed used by the exhibitor, you can add a few seconds to each scene by a little mathematical calculation. This gives the exact length of the musical numbers required for your setting. The mechanical work has been done.

A cue is a signal, sign or symbol denoting the time to begin. Cues should be carefully selected. Titles make the best cues, and long sub-titles are especially effective. They give the orchestra an opportunity of changing without running into the coming scene.

Where the cue is a description of action, care should be taken that the action selected should be well defined and should occur only as an isolated instance. For example we see D—"Mary at well." If Mary goes frequently to the well the cue becomes worthless for practical purposes. Sometimes pictures have similar sub-titles, repeated, such as T—"A week later," and a little further along in the footage the same title appears. The title usually itself indicates a change of music. Time has passed and the situations are changed, necessitating a change in the music. If the music be changed at both titles, all will be well, but otherwise the cue should be written T—"A week later" (first time). For example: Recently a picture was given its initial performance in a hall where an organ supplied the music. The organist received a cue-sheet and was warned regarding the cue "T.—Glory, Glory Hallelujah." It appeared twice; once at the beginning of a scene, where a colored gentleman was hammering it out on a dismal piano, and again at the end of the scene as he stopped playing. The organist missed the first cue entirely, and while the folks gathered around the piano, were singing and beating time to the Battle Hymn of the Republic, he guessed it was a fox-trot and guessed wrong. When the cue appeared the second time, he started "Glory, Glory Hallelujah" and only got to the end of the fourth bar when the scene changed, calling for a slow moderato selection. This made the picture seem ridiculous, almost a burlesque, in fact. Inserts of letters, telegrams, diaries or newspapers are seldom used as cues. These are good so long as there is no duplication of the insert. Let there be no ambiguity in the cues.

The habit of some compilers of cue-sheets to indicate the first two words of a sentence, in a title used as a cue, should be vigorously decried. When a leader must play, direct, and read his cue-sheet, at one and the same time, every effort should be made to make things easy for him. If he inadvertently misses those two little words, the cue is gone and he is lost. Cues should be definite, plain, and clearly comprehensible.

With the cues firmly established, it becomes necessary to study the action following each and determine its bearing on the picture as a whole. The scene of the script may be laid in New York, but in order to show the "bad husband" we see him in a dance hall in a Western city. This may be regarded as a musical parenthesis having no direct bearing on the plot and the setting should be unostentatiously atmospheric. On the other hand this same picture may begin by depicting the peaceful life of the deserted wife, and the happy-go-lucky hero, and their fondness for each other. An Allegretto theme will do nicely here. We then see the hero's father as he returns from a good day's hunt in the Maine Woods. He, too, is happy. It is an exterior and rural scene. Although the dominant emotion is the same it would be wise to change the music to a pastoral motif. The first scenes showed the heroine and hero in interiors. The difference in the musical accompaniment must not be overlooked.

Music portraying happiness will fit in both cases, but for the interior scenes a quality of peace should pervade the composition, while for exterior and pastoral "locations," that light and airy, free-as-the-wind style would be more suitable. Although the dominant emotion is the thing to fit, yet, by analysis of the situations surrounding it, one can enhance the setting materially.

After having determined upon the suitable selections necessary to fit each scene, you can then use the pruning hook. With the climax of your picture firmly fixed in your mind you should go over your setting carefully, piece by piece, and determine whether each is working towards the climax in its proper proportion. Is there a gradual grading upwards? Is the setting, as a whole, smooth? Do the numbers follow in key sequence? Is the music selected for the climax, big enough to fit the situation? Is the theme properly placed?

Your setting is complete with the exception of your first number, the overture to the picture. You should now be fairly familiar with your subject. You have grasped the main thought and know what it's about. Select your first number to fit that thought. You have found the solution of a musical setting, well-timed, atmospheric, supporting the action and one that fits the feature.

Music at the Rialto.

During the week of Jan. 20-27, the Rialto Orchestra, of forty-five men, presented its usual good musical program. Since the opening of the new Rivoli theater, the orchestra does not live up to its previous high-water mark of excellency, owing to the heavy draft of its best men to the other house. It still continues to rank far above the average.

A selection from "The Queen of Sheba," by Goldmark, opened the show, with Hugo Riesenfeld conducting. When Mr. Riesenfeld wields the baton we are always sure of a musicianly and scholarly rendition. A mixed chorus was introduced in the finale, for some reason best known to the management. It may have been for the tableau effect, for the girls were pretty and costumed in the oriental garb. They sang, but no words were audible, since the score calls for forte music and the orchestra completely drowned the voices which were very puny. The overture, itself, was beautifully played.

The next number was regrettable. The old and always reliable song, "Asleep in the Deep," by Petrie, was essayed by one Emanuel List (basso Profundo), former occupation and pedigree unknown to us. Mr. List persistently left the key and was persuaded to return only by sheer force of his accompaniment. The last note—a low D—was sung completely off pitch, and the long-suffering orchestra, in their merciful endeavor to spare him further humiliation, only pretended to play the closing chord. The best part of the solo was the lighting effect. To signify the revolving tower beam of the lighthouse he sang in alternate darkness and "Side Spot." This is new and in keeping with the genius of Mr. Rothapfel, who never fails to spring some suitable surprise.

The fitting of the scenic deserves special mention. A part of "Siegfried," by Wagner, was used to portray the snowy mountains, and it was perfect in its pastoral effect. Much credit is due Mr. Riesenfeld for picking an effective number that exactly covered the picture in time length. The feature, being light, received a good setting, but we thought that instead of using a shoddy "hurry," one of the works of the old masters would have been more suitable for the magnitude of the orchestra. The Rialto orchestra has the instrumentation for capably rendering the best things and should be the first exponent of better music for the pictures.

Gaston Dubois, solo cellist, played "Neapolitan Dance," by Casella. Although a little nervous at the start, he developed wonderful technique and showed a richness of tone that was most pleasing. A cut in this number, to shorten it, would prove effective.

The Prelude to Act IV, from "Carmen," closed the program. It was depicting the Spanish atmosphere throughout.

Musical Suggestion Synopsis.

THE BIRTH OF DEMOCRACY—(Franco-American). THEME for the Heroine—Andante, Suggest "Les Phoenicians" (from Herodiade)—Massenet.

This is a French story throughout, dealing with the stirring days of 1792. It is dramatic with many big scenes. "William Tell," overture; "Faust," No. 2, Gounod-Tavan; "Athalia Overture," Mendelssohn or "Prelude" (from Werther)—Massenet are possible big numbers. "The Marseillaise," and a few light French numbers will be needed. A Peasant dance, a Misterioso and an Agitato can be used. Cue sheet can be obtained from The Merit Film Exchange.

MADAM SPY (Universal). THEME for the Heroine—Allegretto. Suggest "Garden of Love"—Ascher, or "Serenade"—Pierne.

The music must be light, as there is considerable comedy in this picture. A few dramatic numbers for the fourth and fifth reels and a couple of military marches for scenes at Annapolis are needed. Open and close with the theme. Cue sheets can be obtained at the Universal Exchange.

OUR MUTUAL MOTOR—(Metro-Drew). No THEME.

One-reel comedy. Use light opera stuff. No cue sheet available.

WOMAN AND WIFE (Select). THEME for the Heroine—Andante. Suggest "Mother"—Romberg, "Dream of the Flowers"—Cohen, or "A Little Song"—Erdody.

This is "Jane Eyre" picturized. Old English atmosphere. Simplicity should be the keynote of your music. In the last reel use dramatic stuff. Be careful about the proper placing of your theme. Cue sheets can be obtained from Select Exchange.

Three Society Notes from Chicago

They're Authentic, We're Sure, Otherwise Terry Ramsaye Wouldn't Have Indorsed Them with His John Hancock.

THE fact that Mary Miles Minter has a purple pup which is very fond of kraut will travel farther in print than a solemn discussion of the 'mission of the pictures' and a good fighting argument is better publicity than prosperity interviews," remarked Mrs. Elizabeth Sears, publicity director of the American Film Company, Inc. This was the keynote of her address before the Advertising Woman's Club of Chicago at the monthly meeting, held January 15.

Terry Ramsaye, of the Mutual Film Corporation, the sole male guest, faced the gathering of knitting women and made a number of publicity confessions, including the origin of John R. Freuler's movement for the coinage of a fifteen-cent piece, the Charlie Chaplin non-skid tire, and the Edna Goodrich earring watch with the chimes.

Betty Shannon, known to Broadway as "the girl press agent," previously press representative of a number of New York picture concerns, was among those present, in a green "tam," which was said to be the feature of the evening.

H. Winik Suggests a Moses

Thinks Business in a Bad Way and Needs Someone to Lead It Out.

H. WINIK, who returned here from England a few months ago, is today considered by the men who know, one of the most powerful and magnetic personalities in the industry. He is financially interested in a great number of enterprises throughout the world, and is responsible for the Western Import Company, which has purchased the World Rights to Mabel Normand in "Mickey." He has established a film agency in every foreign country, which controls the most successful film productions in the market, including the Triangle for the entire world outside of the United States, and the new First National Exhibitors' Circuit pictures for England. He has never been known to pick a failure and every one of his ventures show a profit on the right side of the ledger.

First and foremost, Mr. Winik is independent. He believes in attacking a problem from all sides. He is one, among many men, whose method of reasoning is both inductive and deductive concerning any subject that engages his attention. He believes in using common sense—"snap judgment" has no play in his category. He digs down to the root of every problem confronting him. He loves brevity.

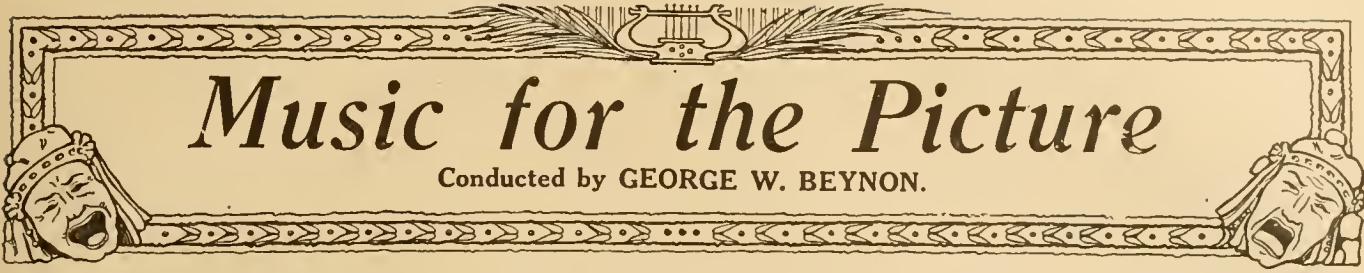

H. Winik.

His foresight is illustrated in the following little anecdote from a page in his career: Two years ago he went to Europe and established nine renting offices in England, handling Triangle and other productions. Four months later, after establishing a good business there, he received a cable from New York, asking him to take the next boat and come here, for there was a big merger pending. His answer was an inquiry for further particulars and the proposition. He did not receive a reply to his inquiry, but surmised the whys and wherefores. The Triangle Company was releasing two big features and two comedies each week, so Mr. Winik, instead of releasing these two dramas and two comedies per week, released only one, and prepared to protect his foreign business and customers for two years thereafter, and the consequence is that his program is made up until March, 1919, consisting of the following stars: Douglas Fairbanks, William S. Hart, Dorothy Dalton, Bessie Barriscale, Lillian Gish, Dorothy Gish, Robert Harron, Charles Ray, Frank Keenan, Norma Talmadge, Louise Glaum, Bessie Love, Mae Marsh and several others.

The scheme devised by the group of gentlemen on this side of the water, now controlling these stars, has failed in the European countries. The market is independent, business is in a healthy condition and Mr. Winik's foresight has secured for him the lasting friendship and support of every exhibitor in Europe.

In an interview, Mr. Winik said: "I have had the most amusing time of my life within the last three months, watching the film industry in this country. When a shoe pinches someone, they know exactly where it hurts them, but there seems to be a continuous howling in this business, and no one knows what it is about. Most of the leaders don't give a rap what happens tomorrow, as long as a good stud poker game, without a limit, can be played today. That is why the entire industry is in such a terrible mess.

"I believe the greatest tonic in the world right now would be just a little plain every-day common sense. Centuries ago the whole world was in an awful mess, like the film business is today, and it took a man like Moses to turn the trick."

Proper Presentation of Pictures Musically.

The Cue Sheet and How to Use It.

The CUE-SHEET is the "First Aid" to the orchestra leader in your theater. Without it he must see the picture before he can select suitable music to fit it. It is a service that you should demand for the betterment of your picture presentation, and you should see to it that your orchestra leader has it in ample time to properly arrange his musical setting.

Sub-Title and Description.

The CUE-SHEET gives him the SUB-TITLE or DESCRIPTION OF ACTION which is used as a cue, denoting the change of scene, and, by the same token, the change of music. After the first performance the leader should have memorized the action immediately preceding the cue, in order to finish his music at the end of a phrase. By changing the tempo of the number being played he can bring his music to a spot where he can finish with finality. By holding out the last note as he turns the page to the next number and, beginning softly with a crescendo to the required volume, he can obviate abrupt stops or noticeable interruptions of the music.

Time.

The CUE-SHEET gives him the APPROXIMATE TIME of each scene, and the music selected fits well with the time allowance. Knowing the time he is better able to select a substitute number of the proper length. If the basis of synchrony is placed at 15 minutes to the 1,000 feet and you run the picture at 12 minutes, the tempo of the picture is accelerated, and the music should be hastened to the same ratio to convey the atmosphere called for.

Name, Author and Character.

The CUE-SHEET gives the NAME, AUTHOR AND CHARACTER of each suggested number. Many numbers are repeated in the various CUE-SHEETS because they lend themselves particularly to pictures and, as the leader dare not repeat too frequently, he must know the character of the music suggested, to pick out some substitute number of a like nature. Your patrons are becoming more fastidious in their musical tastes and demand good music and lots of variety. A number that was used with a fire scene last week, cannot be used for a battle scene this week. By the law of Association of Ideas he will confuse the pictures when referring to them later.

Music that Fits.

CUE-SHEETS are prepared by many musicians of different temperaments. The suggested music may be improved upon by your leader after he has seen the picture once. Sometimes a number is suggested in the cue-sheet evidently for no other reason than that the title fits the situation. For example, we have a love scene beneath a tree—it may be an oak or an elm—and the suggested number is "Under the Old Apple Tree." For a scene in a serious feature such music only burlesques the entire picture. The title of the selection does not count, and music should be used that has no outside associations or irrelevant character.

Accompaniment.

Another fault is the use of numbers that predominate over the scene and attracts the audience by their grandeur, pomp or levity. This detracts from the picture. The motion picture theater is not a concert hall and the accompaniment should be as subservient to the picture as a singer's accompaniment is to the voice.

Theme.

The CUE-SHEET invariably shows a THEME. Sometimes it suggests two or three, but these are decidedly ill-advised. In a small orchestra it is not feasible to use more than one THEME. This number should be placed on the music stand to the left of the feature folio, and a THEME marker placed in the folio, showing when to play it. For instance, Nos. 1, 2 and 3 have been played; No. 4 is the THEME. A marker denotes this and is turned (as though it were a page) as the orchestra takes up the THEME from the side. This leaves No. 5 in full view and means a smooth "segue" with no apparent stop.

The CUE-SHEET fits the predominant emotion and does not consider "flashbacks" or short scenes. These can be frequently handled to good advantage by altering the tempo to suit the action of the "flash-back," or sometimes it is well to allow the organ or piano to improvise; the orchestra taking up their number again on the return to the scene.

Use Standard Works.

Hurries, Agitated, Pathetics, etc., which have been composed for the so-called "Motion Picture Series" have fulfilled their mission and are no longer used in the better houses. The trend is upward and the public are looking for the best in music as well as in pictures. Riots, battles and sob-stuff are always of importance to someone "out front" and should be treated seriously in fitting the music. There are hundreds of classic numbers most adaptable for depicting such scenes among the standard overtures. It would be well worth while to extract these portions and have them copied for use on such occasions. The works of the masters will bear repetition.

Music and Pictures.

Since time began, play-acting has been closely associated with the art of music. Both portray emotion and interpret the heart throbs and pent-up feelings of humanity. They are interwoven closely, and basically, are inseparable. Therefore, do not neglect the music in your theater. Make it a feature. Interest yourself in it and you will find it has box-office value.

Music at the Rivoli.

During the week beginning Jan. 21, Mr. S. L. Rothapel presented his usual good musical program. It was opened by the overture "Slavonic Rhapsody," by Friedemann, conducted by Erno Rapee. Mr. Rapee did not seem to get below the surface to any extent and treated it rather too delicately to fully interpret the restless Slavonic mood.

Mr. Joseph Martel, a baritone, rendered "Cashmiri Song," by Amy Woodforde-Finden, in a splendid manner and resplendent costume. The stage setting for this song was artistically arranged, and with the aid of the perfume machine, gave the true Oriental atmosphere.

Gladys Rice, soprano, followed with "My Old Kentucky Home," accompanied by special scenic effects. Miss Rice has a small voice and got the song over with the aid of wonderful lightings. The Rivoli chorus and orchestra gave a rendition of "The Anvil Chorus" from the opera, "Il Trovatore," by Verdi. This number also had its own special setting and was done in costume, the anvils and hammers being present. Mr. Rothapel has gotten away from the concert idea and is giving his patrons a combination of picture and musical show. All of the musical selections are as pleasing to eye as they are to the ear. We believe that this is another forward step in the film world and feel that if exhibitors followed his example it would make for larger box-office receipts.

Musical Suggestion Synopsis.

WHY HENRY LEFT HOME (Metro-Drew)—Theme, none.

This is a Drew comedy calling for waltzes, light intermezzos or two-steps. Such light operas as "Little Boy Blue"—Lampe, or "The Spring Maid"—Reinhardt, would suit admirably. No cue-sheet available.

THE IMPOSTOR (Mutual)—Theme for the Heroine—Moderato. Suggest "Chanson Sans Parole"—Tschaikowsky, "Sunbeams"—Heller, or "Serenade"—Karganoff.

Open with religious music to fit church scene. The picture is light. No dramatic music is necessary. Waltzes, intermezzos and allegrettos play the picture. Cue-sheet can be obtained from the Mutual Exchange.

THE SPIRIT OF '17 (Paramount)—Theme for the Hero—March. Suggest "Send Me a Curl"—O'Hara, or "Children of the Regiment"—Fueck.

Patriotism plays a big part in this picture and requires many patriotic marches. Light music will do principally. Open with "The Boy Scouts"—Henneberg. Use dramatic music for the rounding up of the German spies, the strike, and the saving of the girl in the mine. Cue-sheet can be obtained from the Paramount Exchange.

THE GATES OF HAPPINESS (World)—Theme for the Heroine—Allegretto. Suggest "Butterflies"—Steinke, "Idilio"—Lack, or "Legend of a Rose"—Reynard.

Dramatic pictures. Requires dramatic music, a couple of misteriosos, and two pastoral numbers. Close with the theme. Cue-sheet can be obtained from the World Exchange.

BROADWAY LOVE (Bluebird)—Theme for Midge—Andantino. Suggest "Premier D'Amour"—Benoist, or "Tendre Aveu"—Schutt.

Bits of dramatic situations are met with that require ingenuity in fitting. Many two-steps and fox-trots can be used. A light opera selection can be used to advantage. Cue-sheet can be obtained from the Bluebird Exchange.

THE MENACE (Vitagraph)—Theme for the Heroine—Andante. Suggest "I Gathered a Rose"—Lee, "Pleading"—Wood, or "Sweet Ponderings"—Langey.

Melodramatic numbers are needed. Many andantes and a few dramatic tension pieces. Have two misteriosos ready towards the end and close with the theme. Cue-sheet can be obtained from the Vitagraph Exchange.

RIMROCK JONES (Paramount)—Theme for the Hero—Allegretto. Suggest "Pulcinella"—Aletter, "Bird of Paradise"—Mathews, or "Serenade"—Kautzenback.

Open with "Bim-Bims"—Adam. The scene changes from Western to Eastern stuff, and a Mexican flavor will help the music. Use some dramatic, pathetic and sensuous stuff. A few waltzes are necessary. Cue-sheet can be obtained from the Paramount Exchange.

IN BAD (Mutual)—Theme for the Heroine—Allegro. Suggest "Pastel Minuet"—Paradis, "Badinage"—Herbert, or "Serenata"—Tarenghi. A big fight ensues; note the dramatic music necessary for the rescue scene, and the misteriosos earlier. Use Mexican-Indian music, if possible. Cue-sheet can be obtained from the Mutual Exchange.

HIS HIDDEN PURPOSE (Paramount-Mack Sennett)—Theme, none. This is a light comedy and needs one-steps, two-steps and fox-trots. No cue-sheet available.

THE CLARION CALL (O. Henry)—Theme for the Hero—Andante. Suggest "Twilight"—Ayer, or "Prelude"—Damrosch.

This is a short dramatic picture filled with action. You will need a few misteriosos, a hurry, light waltz and pathetics. No cue-sheet available.

THE HOPPER (Triangle)—Theme for the Heroine—Allegretto. Suggest "Chanson Sans Parole"—Tschalkowsky, "Butterflies"—Steinke, or "Lips and Eyes"—Lange.

This is a reformed burglar story of the lighter nature. A couple of misteriosos, a few allegros, a pathetic and dramatic selection with a few waltz intermezzos will fill the bill.

A HEART'S REVENGE (Fox)—Theme for the Heroine—Andantino. Suggest "Enchanted Hour"—Mouton, or "Moonbeams"—Keiser.

This picture is filled with action and extremely dramatic. Both the first and second movement of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony could be used to advantage. Russian music is needed for the Baron, Chinese selections for the Ambassador. Finish with the theme. Cue-sheet can be obtained at Fox Exchange.

THE FIGHTING GRIN (Bluebird)—Theme for the Hero—Allegretto. Suggest "Canzonetta"—D'Ambrosia, or "Serenade"—Schubert.

Brightness is the chief ingredient needed for the music. A few dramatic situations crop up, and a love story needs some amorous numbers to fill it out. Cue-sheet can be obtained at Bluebird Exchange.

MOROK (Hesperia)—Theme for the Hero—Andante and Morosa. Suggest "Song of the Boatman of the Volga"—Cady, or "Kol Nidrei"—Bruch.

Oriental music is needed. Dramatic situations abound. Many hurrys and agitados can be used. It is seven reels and requires a first viewing, if possible, in order to properly present the picture.

FIVE TO FIVE (Christie)—Theme, none. A comedy of clean variety. Light operatic selections and allegrettos will fit. No cue-sheet available.

MANY A SLIP (Christie)—Use an Andantino theme for the Jewelry and bring it in whenever it is discovered. Suggest "Melodie"—Lederer, or "Venetian Romance"—Hildreth.

The balance of the setting should be made up of bright stuff, a few misteriosos and one dramatic number.

THE SUPERSTITIOUS GIRL (Edison)—Theme, none. This is a one-reel comedy, slap-stick variety, and calls for jazzy music. No cue-sheet available.

THE BULL'S EYE (Universal)—Theme for the Heroine—Andantino. Suggest "Astarte"—Mildenberg, or "Poppyland"—Kiefert.

This is a serial picture calling for many hurrys and agitados, a few love themes and dramatic music. It is Western in atmosphere and Mexican numbers will fit beautifully. No cue-sheet available.

THE STUDIO GIRL (Select)—Theme for the Heroine—Allegretto. Suggest "Lass with the Delicate Air"—Faur, "Aubade Printaniers"—Lacombe, or "Along Came Another Girl"—Romberg.

You will need some dramatic music, but in the main light waltzes and intermezzos will do nicely. Close the picture with the theme. Cue-sheet can be obtained at the Select Exchange.

THE WIDOW'S MIGHT (Paramount)—Theme for the Heroine—Valse lento. Suggest "Sleeping Rosa"—Borch, "Inamorata"—Marchetti, or "The Way of Love"—Cremieux.

Another Julian Eitings production requiring light treatment. Please do not use a big hurry in the chase scene. It spots the effect. Many waltzes and light intermezzos are necessary. A couple of light operatic selections could be used to advantage, such as "The Merry Widow"—Lehar, and "The Madcap Duchess"—Herbert.

There is only one dramatic situation and that comes in the fifth reel.

Questions Answered—Suggestions Offered.

Q. "Can I procure a musician (cellist) capable of playing big selections?"

A. "If it is a union man wanted apply to your local union. If no union in your town, Local 310 of New York can supply you. A non-union man can be supplied by us if you so desire."

Q. "Who wrote 'The Wanderer's Song'?"

A. "Tschalkowsky. This is one of the best of his few writings for voice."

Q. "Are you in favor of using the drum traps for every effect in a picture?"

A. "No. Discretion must be used, else it becomes annoying to your patrons. See our article in a recent issue, 'Fitting the Picture.'"

Q. "Can some of the scores put out by the Triangle be procured without booking the picture?"

A. "Write Mr. Bristol of the Triangle Exchange, this city. We believe they have some left over and would dispose of them."

Q. "What is the usual rental charged for orchestral scores for pictures?"

A. "One dollar a day for small orchestra and two dollars for large."

Proper Presentation of Pictures Musically.

The Theme.

IT MAY be that you, too, have suffered. It may have happened that you entered a theater to see Mary Pickford or Doug. Fairbanks earn their paltry stipend. It is possible that after you had enjoyed the Comedy and Review, the feature you came to see was thrown upon the screen and you settled back in your seat, for an hour and a quarter of unadulterated joy. The orchestra opens the picture with a beautiful number as Miss Mary is introduced. The music changes. In a few minutes the first selection is played again. It's a nice number. Two or three short numbers intervene and you hear it again. It's a fair number. An agitato follows, it is repeated and becomes a monotonous number. The third reel is being shown, and again you hear it. You cannot understand why they play it so much. It palls. As the music continues, this poor little number is dragged in by the heels whenever Mary appears in the foreground, until your soul rebels and you hate that music forever. This innocent little musical piece that has caused you so much irritation is called the THEME.

Nevertheless the Theme has a definite and well-defined purpose, and if used properly enhances the picture presentation immeasurably. It should be selected carefully with due consideration for the character, episode, or thought which it represents. It may be given to the hero, heroine, villain, or ingenue, and in pictures where an act is performed frequently for a purpose it may be used to denote that purpose or in an allegorical picture to show the thought for which certain scenes stand. Sometimes two or more Themes are often used, but are totally impracticable for small combinations of musicians, but effective when played by large orchestras because there is always a second man to each instrument. While the first plays, the second turns the pages and ferrets out the particular Theme wanted.

Naturally the selection of a Theme is the most important feature in the setting of the picture. To choose a waltz intermezzo as the motif for Jean Valjean in "Les Miserables" would be ridiculous, and the selection of a dramatic number for Rebecca in "Rebecca of Sunnyside Farm" would be foolish. A careful study of the character represented and for what it stands should be made with due consideration for the dominant feeling of the play.

If the Theme be picked for the star in a heavy drama, and her part in the play is dramatic, the natural selection would be a dramatic Theme, such as Cavatina (Bohm), Prelude (Damrosch) or Prelude (Rachmaninoff). If the plot be heavy and the entire setting cumbersome and labored it would be well to give the Theme to the ingenue or to a lighter role, thus gaining variety of color in the music. Just as photography and lighting plays an important part in picturization, so coloring, varied tempi and shading must be considered in the music.

Of course, all this cannot be done at the first performance of a feature, if the leader has had no opportunity of viewing the picture. In that case he must depend on a furnished cue sheet which may, or may not, suggest a number in his library. On the other hand, the number suggested may be one which he has used recently and is not permissible, but after he has seen the picture, heard his incidental music in the setting, noted the high-lights in the play, and closely sized up the general situation with regard to his orchestral requirements, he can usually add a 50 per cent. value to his musical presentation by a better selection of his Theme.

Speaking for the benefit of the small orchestra playing for pictures (and they are in the majority), the modus operandi should be as follows: After the Theme has been selected it should be placed in its proper rotation with the other numbers, selected to fit the picture. Playing your musical setting in order, you presently arrive at the cue which requires the Theme. You play it until your next cue, then taking it out of the folio, you place it on the extreme left of your music stand, where it is in plain view all the time and continue to play the following number. This necessitates no more retarding of music than the usual turning of a page. As each player gets the opportunity for resting, he can "fix" the Theme exactly as he wants it without interfering with the number being played. In time you reach the cue requiring the Theme again. As you finish your selection leading to it you turn it over to the left of your folio, proceed to play the Theme which is exposed on the further left, until the next change. Then turning back to your folio you find the next number exposed on the right. This process is repeated throughout the entire setting and precludes any searching for the Theme or stoppage of the music. Some progressive orchestra leaders have stiff cardboard sheets printed with Theme and insert these in the folio where the Theme must be played. This is a good idea and makes the setting fool-proof. Fox Trots, One-Steps or Two-Steps make poor themes and are seldom used as such, but are permissible under certain conditions, in a Chaplin comedy or one that runs more than one reel. For example if the comedian's chief stunt is to fall asleep throughout the picture a good Theme would be "Please Go 'Way and Let Me Sleep." Carrying out this principle, it is a simple matter to judge the Theme necessary for a Comedy. Waltzes and Waltz-intermezzos are little used except for pictures in which children are starred. The Moderato movements, Allegros and Allegrettos are chiefly suggested and should be definitely melodious, catchy if possible to establish the association of ideas. Andantinos will fit the more serious character while Andantes, Lentos and Adagios are reserved for the dramatic roles.

As pictures become more psychological, Themes will be chosen to represent the trend of the play and will become in reality a motif, signifying the underlying or hidden objective. "Gold—The Lust of Ages," gives splendid scope for a Theme representing gold and its power. Because it shows a series of episodes picturing the ruination of manhood wrought by the power of Gold, the Theme becomes the logical finish to each episode.

Nothing requires more careful thought than the selection of the Theme in fitting a picture, but the importance of its use cannot be overlooked. In features where the cast is small and the star is really the picture, being always in the foreground, the Theme should not be used frequently but only in the big moments. If it is a bright Theme, and one of the telling scenes finds our principal in tears, it can be played slowly and softly, giving the desired pathos and holding the required atmosphere. The too frequent use of the Theme is a detriment to the musical interpretation of the picture, annoys the patrons of the theater and kills the particular selection for further use. Choose long Themes. Use discretion in their selection. Play them according to the action, and only when a motif is required. The results will amply justify the time and thought given to this most important subject.

Fitting the Scenic.

For sometime the exhibitor has given careful consideration to the musical fitting of his feature picture. It has been with pride that he has pointed to the many detailed effects worked into the scenes by his orchestra. He has hired expert electricians to take care of his lighting effects and regarded the feature as the big moment in his show. So far as the Pictorial Review, the Comedy and the Scenic were concerned, he felt that, by playing a march, a two-step and a waltz respectively, that his musical program was complete.

The day has come when he must look to his laurels again. New Ideas prevail and what used to be good enough is now passé.

Scenics are divided into classes, and we prefer to regard educational films in the light of scenics. Thus we have a wide field to cover. There is the panorama of nature, the great Rockies, Alps and Cataluki, or the mighty Frazer river, the Grand Canyon, celebrated parks and gardens. There is the zoological film, showing animals in their native haunts; fishery scenes, industrial plants, botanical studies, the life of bees, foreign countries, their habits and well-known landmarks, and many other varieties. It has been the custom to portray all these by playing a waltz.

A waltz as an accompaniment to the scenic is just that—an accompaniment. The waltz cannot knit the minds of the patrons to the panoramic beauties displayed, neither can it portray the atmosphere of the great outdoors. It usually speaks of love, sensuousness, or a touch of sadness. If it be bright, or an intermezzo, it depicts joy, gladness, piquancy or dance rhythm. Wherein do these emotions fit the grandeur of nature, the towering mountains, or sylvan glades? If such scenes were shown in the feature, the orchestra leader would receive severe censure should he play a waltz to fit them. Then why expect the leopard to change his spots? If it cannot fit a nature scene in the feature it surely cannot fit 1,000 ft. devoted entirely to nature.

By the same reasoning it cannot fit animal scenes, Oriental cities, flower gardens, or any situation wherein no physical or mental emotion is portrayed. Therefore we are forced to admit that waltzes cannot further be used with justification to ourselves and our patrons.

What must be used? By the process of eliminating all the musical selections breathing emotion; all marches, one-steps and two-steps, which would be incongruous, and side-stepping waltzes of all kinds, we have but one class of music from which to choose, namely, description numbers.

These are the pieces composed especially to describe conditions, elements or thought.

For example, "Morning Mood," by Grieg, is distinctly pastoral and of sufficient length to fit one reel of quiet nature study, or shepherd stuff. "Berceuse," from "Jocelyn"; "A Shepherd's Tale," by Nervo; "Merry Wives of Windsor," by Nicolai; "Nymphs and Fauns," by Bemberg; "Pastel Menuet," by Paradis, or "Scenes from Switzerland," by Lang, would fit scenes of this kind. By going into grand opera music one finds such gems as "Siegfried's Idyl," "Tribut de Zamora" and others, admirably suited to depict nature.

For light breezy scenes use "Murmuring Zephyrs," Jensen, or "April Moods," by Eugene; while for big wind storms at the seashore "Scotch Poem," MacDowell.

For pictures of birds and butterflies, why not play "The Magpie and the Parrot," Bendix; "The Squirrel Parade," Crosby; "Butterflies," Steinke; "Dance of the Moths," Weidt; "Robins' Farewell," Bendix; or "The Gentle Dove," Bendix?

For distant lands the selections should be chosen with a view to their characteristics. For India, Oriental music; for Japan, Japanese music; or for Egypt, Egyptian music. For example, suppose we have an Egyptian picture, a good opening would be the playing of "Salaam Effindina," which is the Egyptian national hymn. Every leader should have an album containing all the national airs, because they are easily procured and are vitally essential. After the picture has been introduced a Mosque is shown with the populace at prayer—"Orientale," Cui, would fit. Oriental dances are plentiful and could be used to bear out the atmosphere. If possible, close the picture by repeating the national hymn so that it finishes with the last bar.

It is just as important to hold the atmosphere of the Scenic as to portray the action in the Feature. The very fact that the program is selected to give variety to your patrons, make it imperative that your music should change with the pictures and emphasize the point that you are trying to make.

Music for "Lest We Forget."

The big dramatic war picture, "LEST WE FORGET," featuring Rita Jolivet, and now playing at the Lyric Theater, is a musical triumph.

Ten weeks, involving considerable research work, were spent in compiling the score. An orchestra of thirty pieces, under the personal direction of George W. Beynon, give a wonderful rendition of the classics of the old masters. The music is tuneful, serious and filled with big moments.

Much credit is due Monsieur Leon Perret, who directed the picture, for his careful collaboration with the composer. During the "shooting of the scenes," Mr. Perret, who is a personal friend of Massenet, and well versed musically, considered the appropriate music and timed his scenes accordingly. For example, when "THE STAR SPANGLED BANNER" is being sung by the American soldiers in the trenches, there is just enough footage allowed to finish it; thus its dignity is maintained and there is no "chopping off" process necessary.

Good music is an insurance policy on your picture, providing against ridicule and burlesque. If more producers realized this and saw to it that their directors and musical director got together on the score, greater box-office receipts would be the reward.

Returning to the feature, it opens with the Marsellaise Hymn, a tribute to Miss Jolivet, one of the few survivors of the ill-fated Lusitania, at the same time carrying with it the suggestion that the story is French in atmosphere.

When the heroine is introduced the orchestra plays the soprano aria from "Manon" (Massenet). Nothing else would fit her introduction, because we are next shown the opera in progress, with Miss Jolivet in the leading role. In the mind of Harry Winslow, the hero, she and the opera are closely connected. The audience feels the same association of ideas and this aria is repeated as the "Theme" throughout.

For the love scene, "My Heart at Thy Sweet Voice," from "Samson and Delilah" (Saint Saens), is used, while the German spy system is portrayed by Verdi's "La Forza del Destino." During the French preparations for war, "Le Chanson du Depart" (Lorraine), and "Sambre-Meuse" marches are played to wonderful effect.

Towards the finish of the picture, the "Triumphal March" from "Aida" and "The Stars and Stripes," by Sousa, typify the eventful success of the Allies and the part that America plays in the hastening of peace.

The Pathetic numbers recalled are Asa's "Tod," Grieg's "Elegy"; Massenet's "Adagio Pathetique," Godard's "Adagio Lamentoso," from "Symphony Pathetique," Tschalkowsky's "Adagio Cantabile" from the sonata by Beethoven.

Besides the opera "Manon," before mentioned, we are given a glimpse of "Carmen" and "Cleopatra." The music used is that played for the particular scenes of the opera and is synchronized beautifully.

The big scenes of the battle are accompanied by such dynamic numbers as "La Chevalka," from "La Valkyrie," by Wagner; "The Tempest," from "William Tell" overture, while Grieg's "Storm at Sea" is used for the sinking of the Lusitania.

An unusual idea crops up in the "flash" of American boys whistling. The year is supposed to be 1915 and the orchestra whistles one of the popular hits of that year. It is novel and well done and received considerable applause from an appreciative audience.

Probably the biggest effort ever attempted in pictures is the introduction of the "Liebestod" (Love Death) music from "Tristan and Isolde." Wagnerian music is fundamentally dramatic and this particular selection is most appropriate. A German spy, in love with the heroine, enters her apartment at night and forces his attentions upon her; she becomes desperate and by a clever ruse manages to bind him to a couch with her girdle cord, smothering him to death with a pillow. The music literally carries the action, working up and up to the climax with a stupendous effect and dying away again as she realizes what she has done.

Without a question, the music to this feature transcends anything since "The Birth of a Nation." The Metro is providing a score and cue sheet for the use of exhibitors, prepared by Mr. Beynon, that should certainly be obtained for a proper presentation of "LEST WE FORGET."

Music Suggestion Synopsis.

THE OTHER MAN (Vitagraph)—Theme for Heroine—Valse Lento. Suggest "Sleeping Rose"—Borch, "Dreaming of You"—Lehar, "Destiny Waltz"—Baynes.

This is a comedy-drama, requiring many light numbers. Use Intermezzo to vary the waltz movements. You will need a popular two-step for the ballroom scene in the first reel, and agitato in the third, and close with the theme. Cue sheet can be obtained from the Vitagraph Exchange.

THE PHANTOM RIDERS (Universal)—Theme for Hero—Alegro. Suggest "Pitchounette"—Massenet, "Prelude"—Jarnfeldt.

Another Western story filled with drama and fighting scenes. Some galops are needed, and "The Earl King" Agitato by Schubert can be used nicely in the fifth reel.

THE BARGAIN (W. H. Productions, Inc.)—Theme for Heroine—Andante. Suggest "Longing"—Flordia, "Meditation"—Drumm, or "Visions"—Tscharkowsky.

The story is Western in atmosphere and needs the Mexican tang to the music. "Morning Mood," Grieg, can be used for the opening scene. A few galops are necessary to play for pursuits; a couple of pathetics and two dramatic numbers can be used. For the dance hall use a fox trot or a two step. Cue sheets can be obtained from W. H. Productions Co., Inc.

FLARE-UP SAL (Paramount)—Theme for Heroine—Moderato. Suggest "Melodie"—Karganoff, "Vanity Caprice"—Jackson.

This is a mining camp story dance hall variety. In the first reel you need a good pastoral to open, a couple of Mexican one-steps and an adagio pathetic. The second reel is neutral, requiring moderato stuff. In the third reel you need religious music for the church scene. A few galops and agitados are needed. Close with the theme. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paramount Exchange.

LOADED DICE (Pathe)—Theme for the Hero—Andante—Misterioso. Suggest "En Mer"—Holmes, "Quo Vadis"—Nouges, "L'Automne"—Glasnow.

A heavy drama requiring big stuff throughout. A couple of overtures would fit, and you require some light intermezzos to fill in with. Pathetics and dramatics will be in the majority. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Pathe Exchange.

LEST WE FORGET (Metro)—See "Music for 'Lest We Forget'" in this Department.

BROKEN TIES (World)—Theme, none.

This is a society drama, opening up with andante music. You will need lots of heavy stuff, a couple of dramatic agitados and a few waltz lentos. Cue sheet can be obtained from the World Exchange.

THE EYES OF MYSTERY (Metro)—Theme for the Heroine—Andante. Suggest "Awakening of Spring"—Bach, Dialogue"—Meyer-Helmund, "Evensong"—Martin.

This is a melodrama and calls for big stuff. Many misteriosos are necessary and a few hurrys can be used to advantage. Cue sheet can be obtained from the Metro Exchange.

UNDER THE INFLUENCE (Metro-Drew)—Theme, none.

Light treatment is required for this comedy. Do not use fox trots, as waltzes and light intermezzos are more in keeping with the refined atmosphere.

TARZAN OF THE APES (National)—Theme—Something wierd and uncanny but Allegro. Suggest "Dance of the Harples"—Hadley.

Many pastoral numbers are needed. Bright intermezzos and a few misteriosos. It would be well to flavor the setting with a little oriental music in the last couple of reels.

Carey in a Western Heads Universal "Wild Woman" Is Its Title—Other Features for February 25 Week Are Comedies and Serials.

UNIVERSAL'S lead-off card in the program scheduled for release during the week of Feb. 25 is "Wild Woman," a five-reel feature on the order of the old Harry Carey subject, "Love's Lariat." It tells the story of the adventures which befell Cheyenne Harry and his partners, following a wild and woolly celebration of the former's victory at a rodeo. In the cast surrounding Harry Carey are Molly Malone, Martha Mattox, Vester Pegg and Edward Jones.

"Watch Your Watch" is the Nestor comedy for the week. It features Eileen Sedgwick and Ernie Shields, two screen favorites who have appeared in many Universal productions. The plot revolves about the efforts of a girl to keep from her fiance the knowledge that another admirer has presented her with a watch. This comedy is said to be one of the most amusing released under the Nestor brand.

The L-Ko comedy is entitled "Ambrose the Lion Hearted," and features Mack Swain. Movie fans will remember Swain as having been identified in former days with the Keystone organization. Swain enacts the role of an enormously powerful but tender-hearted blacksmith, who takes it upon himself to right the wrongs inflicted upon the heroine by a black-hearted "villun." This comedy is in two reels.

The serials for the week include Episode 14 of "The Mystery Ship" and Episode 4 of "The Bull's Eye." In the first "The Masked Rider," the man of mystery, continues to exert his efforts on behalf of Betty Lee, as enacted by Neva Gerber, and Miles Gaston, as portrayed by Ben Wilson. As in previous episodes of this serial a number of unusual photographic effects are introduced.

"Still in the Ring" is the title of the fourth "Bull's Eye" episode. In it Cody is seen following up his pursuit of Sweeney. Like the episodes which have preceded it this chapter closes with Cody in a dangerous predicament. Both Eddie Polo and Vivian Reed continue to do excellent work in this serial.

The Universal Animated Weekly and the Universal Current Events and the Universal Screen Magazine are also included in the week's program. Of unusual interest is a one-reel special. This is a Finley Nature Study subject, entitled "Rambles with a Naturalist." A naturalist takes a party of children on a ramble and shows them through a telescope the things they cannot see with the naked eye. First comes the life of a frog from the egg stage to the development of the full-grown frog. Other interesting subjects are the spotted sandpiper and the baby night hawk or bulbat.

The Art in Musical Settings.

RECENTLY we have been regaled by articles appearing in The Literary Digest, Cleveland Plaindealer, Dramatic Mirror, and the New York Globe dealing more or less erroneously with the subject of fitting music to pictures. We are glad that at last the light is snatched from beneath the bushel. It is a frank admission of the importance of music with pictures, but accurate facts should be obtained before the public is given data that is misleading. It is not our intention to enter into controversy upon the subject, but, in view of its seriousness and timeliness, it behooves us to give the exhibitor the important facts concerning this vital question.

In the first place the business of setting pictures is unquestionably an art. Music stands out prominently as one of the allied arts, plastic, and subject to many interpretations. There is nothing cut-and-dried about it. It is a subject unlimited and bounded with no well defined lines. To work in it requires years of close study, and a knowledge gained by constant application. There is an art in choosing a suitable program for a song recital, and divulging variety of color, change of tempo, and divergency of character. The arranging of a symphony concert requires a superlative knowledge of music to meet the demands of the melody-loving patrons. The proper treatment of any art is an art in itself.

Pictures are a comparatively recent innovation. Music is as old as the centuries. To fit these together, in such a manner, to convey a message to the minds of the audience, to get the atmosphere of a scene, and enhance it; to bolster up the weak spots in a film by beautiful melody or strength of chords, is truly an art.

Names of pieces do not always convey of the meaning of the music, and selections of a given name may be used for totally different scenes and still be appropriate. "The Swan," by Saint Saens, may have been written to picture "Swans on the bosom of a lake," but if one had to wait for a particular scene of that kind before applying it, once in a life time would it be heard. If we waited for a good woman to dream her last dream before using "Last Dream of the Virgin," by Massenet, this Andante number might never be used. It breathes holiness and peace, and is most appropriate for ecclisiastical services, prayer, or saintly reverence. Even in the more popular or semi-classical field names mean little. The true sentiment is shown in the melody, the arrangement of chords, and the musical form. The accentuation marks, the tempo sign, and phrasing further enlighten you as to the interpretation meant by the composer.

Music is a universal language, perfectly understood by Spanish, Italian, Russian, or English players, and it is a peculiar thing that every professional musician reads in a score the same thoughts. Changes of rendition are few, and the same tempo are maintained with but few exceptions. Musicians do not read titles. They read notes, and understand their meaning.

Thus we see that by disregarding the name but by analyzing the sentiment and getting the dominant emotion one number will fit many scenes dealing in the same emotion. For example, we have "One Who Has Yearned Alone," by Tchaikowsky. The name in this case is most appropriate, the sentiment being the sorrow of loneliness. Analyzing the composition, we find that the dominant emotion is that of utter sadness, desolation, or intense grief. This number will fit thousands of scenes where the characters and situations are entirely different, and yet be perfect in its suitability. "A Keltie Lament," by Foulds, signifies by its name the lamentations of the Irish, but further analysis shows a dignity in the sentiment of sorrow, with a hope of future emancipation. This, too, will fit diverse scenes. "Romance," by Karganoff, is another sad number of a lighter nature. Its pathos is not deep seated, but speaks more of regret. We have purposely chosen for our examples three numbers marked Andante Sostenuto to show that it is an art to pick the proper piece to suit the scene.

Synchronization is only a matter of the stop-watch with a knowledge of subtraction and addition, so far as the viewing of the picture in the projection room is concerned. But synchronization goes further. In selecting a number for the score allowances must be made to overcome the change of speed of the operating machine. It is almost impossible to take a given number of bars of a "Hurry" and make it fit. If the conductor be fortunate in striking the right tempo (one which corresponds with the speed of the film) he can carry it no further than the following cue, but it is purely luck. The difficulty lies in the fact that a fast Allegro is not elastic. For perfect synchrony numbers with pause notes, change of tempo, or drawn-out endings are to be desired. These act as a block-signal system and insure against overrunning the cue. To properly gauge these blocks does not altogether lie in mathematics, but requires considerable musicianly art.

Be not misled by the idea that a profusion of numbers make a good musical setting. Few pictures need more than an average of six selections to the reel. This gives thirty numbers to a five-reel feature, including repetitions of the theme. The fewer the better for a smooth performance. It is a grave mistake to fit every "dash" or "close-up," because it produces an irritating effect on the audience owing to its "choppiness." A long theme comprising short phrases is to be preferred to gain the best effects in quality.

It is neither right nor necessary to "kill" a composition by forcing it into a gap too small for it. Remember that the theater orchestra has a responsibility toward the American public that cannot be lightly overlooked. Few people can afford to go to the opera, the symphony concerts or recitals of chamber music, yet the orchestra leader can play for their benefit the best excerpts from all the masterpieces. Already the uplift in motion music is felt, and the people are demanding better stuff. It lies with the musical directors throughout this country to continue the educating of the masses to the higher class of music. It is noble work, and if well performed becomes in itself a mighty reward. In fitting the picture do not lose sight of the interpretation intended by the composer.

Music at the Strand.

The Strand, under the managing direction of Harold Edel, presented during the week of February 10-17 an excellent program, as far as selections were concerned, but somewhat mangled in its rendition.

Opening with Offenbach's "Orpheus" overture, the orchestra, as conducted by Oscar Spirescu, did its best work. The "attack" was excellent, the diminuendos and crescendos splendid, and the changing of themes particularly well done. However, the violin solo somewhat marred the overture as a whole, the work not being very clean cut, and the intonation bad. The ending worked up, though, to fine effect, and altogether was very good and smooth.

The music for the scenic was especially pleasing and well fitted.

Charles Semrof, baritone, sang in excellent voice, but somewhat confused his auditors by his "lightning change" from "The Trumpeters" to "Homeward Bound." It might be mentioned, too, that his enunciation was rather faulty, which was covered up to an extent by the entirely too loud accompaniment by the orchestra. The costuming, lighting and scenic effects were pleasing, and aided materially in the general scheme.

The fitting of the feature savored of "unpreparedness," for it was very choppy and not as smooth as one would expect or like to hear. All pictures should be specially fitted ahead to insure a pleasing performance.

Another vocal selection, the duet from "Rigoletto," was well handled by the baritone, who sang in very good voice, but the general effect was not so pleasing owing to the handicap imposed by the soprano, whose voice was harsh and thin, and who seemed to be particularly ill at ease in her work. As a whole, the duet was well received, the honors going entirely to the baritone.

Leaders' Service Bureau.

Questions Answered—Suggestions Offered.

Q. I have a theater seating five hundred, which is located in a town of ten thousand population. My receipts do not warrant more than a three-piece orchestra—piano, violin and drum. My drummer is very bad and drowns out the other music. Would you suggest getting a better drummer, or substituting some other instrument?

A. In a small combination like yours we believe drums are out of place. We would suggest procuring a cellist.

Q. My orchestra plays one reel of pictures and rests the next, and as most of the features run five reels, you readily see that in alternating reels this way every other time the picture comes around the orchestra is playing a different set of reels, but using the same music, which does not "fit." My leader insists that this is the custom in the larger cities. Is he right or wrong?

A. Your leader is wrong. The following custom prevails in theaters that have no organ to relieve the orchestra: The orchestra plays part of the pictorial review, alternating with the piano, according to the judgment of the leader. If a two-reel comedy drama is shown it is played throughout by the orchestra. The pianist plays the comedy alone, and the orchestra plays the entire feature with only ten minutes' intermission, when the pianist again officiates.

Q. I have an orchestra of six pieces—piano, violin, clarinet, cornet, trombone and drums. They play pretty good music, but the folks in my town are kind of tired of them. Maybe if I would change some of the pieces I could get better results. What changes would you suggest?

A. Your orchestral combination is too "brassy" for pictures. Use piano, violin, cello, flute, clarinet and drums, and watch the good results.

Q. For two years I have been "fitting the picture" with an electric piano. Now along comes a salesman who wants to sell me a five thousand dollar orchestrion. I am perplexed. Would it be better to use this money for a real orchestra, or continue on the mechanical way? My patrons say the electric piano is out of date.

A. Would strongly advise spending the five thousand for an orchestra in keeping with the size of your theater.

Q. Ever since "The Birth of a Nation" played my town the people have gone crazy over "Fitting the Pictures," as you call it, and keep asking me to have my orchestra, consisting of eight men, play this same music for my features. Is the score for this available, and would it fit most "battle" pictures?

A. This score is not available for ordinary use, and would not fit your pictures as a general rule. A list of its contents can be secured and you can add these selections to your library.

Q. I notice you state in your reviews that "Cue Sheets can be obtained." I am a leader in a small town with only one antiquated music store that carries popular sheet music only. As my library is very limited, oftentimes I cannot get the selections suggested, or even get suitable numbers with the movements indicated. Is there not some album published that would give me a wide range of music that could be applied to most any "Cue Sheet"?

A. "Concert Album" No. 1 and 2 (G. Schirmer) and "Album of Overtures," Vols. I, II, III (Carl Fischer), will fit any "Cue" Sheet. Of course, you must have a small library in addition, as these will not play a picture throughout.

Q. Last week I had trouble with my orchestra, four "Union" players, all on account of putting in another man who was "Non-Union." As there is no "Local" in this town, and as my "Union" musicians all belong to "Locals" in other cities, and as my new man cannot join the "Union," for there is none here to join, did the others have a right to make the kick and keep the "Non-Union" fellow out?

A. Legally they have no right in the matter, but it would be policy, if you desire to hold your "Union" men, to refrain from foisting on them a "Non-Union" player.

Musical Suggestion Synopsis.

CARMEN OF THE KLONDIKE (Paralta)—Theme for the Heroine—Moderato Suggest "Land of Dreams," Driffl; "Jacqueline," Behr, or "Melodie," Friml.

Open with a pastoral overture. Follow it with theme and then "John Brown's Body" when the colored gentleman is playing piano. In the fourth reel try to procure that old song of 1898, "Come Kiss Yo' Baby." This is a direct cue. Many dramatic and hurrys are needed, while for the big fist fight scene in the last reel, which is five minutes in length, we would suggest using "Rondo Capriccioso," Mendelssohn, or some other appropriate overture. Cue sheet can be obtained from the Paralta Exchange.

DIVINE SACRIFICE, THE (World)—Theme for the Heroine—Moderato Cantabile. Suggest "Cavatina," Bohm; "Elysian Dreams," Reviland, or "Heart of Mine," Smith.

This is a heavy drama. It opens brightly and requires a Wedding March, and in the first reel a couple of Andantes. Pathetic stuff and furioso in the third. The entire fourth and fifth need Andante and Andantino numbers, closing with the Wedding March. Cue sheet can be obtained from the World Exchange.

GRAIN OF DUST, A (Crest)—Theme for the Heroine—Andantino. Suggest "Premier D'Amour," Benoist, or "Tendre Aveu," Schutt.

Melodramatic music is needed, a few pathetic, and some hurrys. No cue sheet available.

HANDS DOWN (Bluebird)—Theme for Dago Sam—Italian Folk Song. Suggest "Amari Amari," "O Sole Mio," or "Funicule Funicula."

This is a Western story and needs the Western treatment. Two-steps, Fox-trots, Galop, and some dramatic bits. Cue sheet can be obtained from Universal Exchange.

HER BOY (Metro)—Theme for the Mother—Andantino. Suggest "Consolation," Liszt; "Remembrance," Debussy, or "Melodie," Tchaikowsky.

An emotional drama taking place in the South. It is patriotic in the extreme, and will require a medley of patriotic songs if possible. Many pathetic selections are required with a Southern atmosphere to them. Use "O' Kentucky Home," "Swanee River," etc., as fill in music for neutral scenes. In the fourth reel soldiers are singing "We'll Hang the Kaiser to a Sour Apple Tree." Use the "Battle Hymn of the Republic" as the melody necessary. This should be followed by church music. Cue sheet can be obtained from Metro Exchange.

HIRED MAN, THE (Paramount)—Theme for the Hero—Tempo di Valse. Suggest "Brise du Soir," Gillet; "Mimi," Gardner, or "Night Song," Faurot.

Most light stuff will do for this picture. Allegros, Allegrettos and Waltz Intermezzos. Towards the end of the fourth reel have ready a two-step, immediately following it with the Virginia Reel. The opening of the fifth is dramatic and requires big stuff. An overture which opens Andante will play the reel by closing with the Theme. Cue sheet can be obtained from the Paramount Exchange.

MARIONETTES, THE (Select)—Theme for the Heroine—Andantino. Suggest "Pleading," Wood; "Esperanza," Johnston, or "Midsummer's Night Serenade," Albeniz.

French atmosphere. Choose music from Massenet, Bizet, Saint-Saens, or Berlioz. During the show of the Marionettes use "The Dance of the Marionettes" if possible. Some dramatic music is necessary, but the lighter vein prevails. Cue sheet can be obtained from the Select Exchange.

MOTHER'S SIN, A (Vitagraph)—Theme for the Heroine—Moderato. Suggest "Barcarole," Offenbach, or "Bowl of Pansies," Reynard.

This is a society drama requiring a few Valse Lentos, some heavy stuff, and two misteriosos. In the last reel use some hunting scene selection. Close with the Theme. Cue sheet can be obtained from the Vitagraph Exchange.

NEW LOVE FOR OLD (Universal)—Theme for Marie Beauchamp—Valse Lento. Suggest "Dodola," Frey; "Heartstrings," Vecsey, or "The Way of Love," Cremieux.

A little Italian music will be needed for the character of Louis Bracchi. Many pastoral numbers will fit the exteriors, and some dramatic music is necessary for the dynamic scenes. Cue sheet can be obtained from the Universal Exchange.

STELLA MARIS (Paramount)—Theme for the Heroine—Religioso. Suggest "Thais Meditation," Massenet; "Serenade," Tchaikowsky, or "Evening Devotion," Kohler.

It might be a good idea if your orchestra can do so to use two themes in this picture, and play an Andante selection for the dual role. Suggest "Love's Longing," Frontal; "In Roseland," Eugene, or "Dialogue," Meyer-Helmund. Many Waltzes are necessary, a few Allegrettos and Moderatos. In the second reel a light hurry and a dramatic tension are needed. Cue sheet can be obtained from the Paramount Exchange.

TURN OF A CARD, THE (Paralta)—Theme for Millie—Moderato. Suggest "Amaranthus," Gilder; "Berceuse," Gounod, or "Sunbeams," Helier.

This is an oil field picture. Dramatic situations abound, and the location changes from Western atmosphere to Eastern. In the first reel a dramatic Agitato is needed. During the fire scene in the second reel would suggest "Figaro's Hochzeit," Mozart, as a fitting number. A couple of dramatic selections, two Waltzes, a Western Allegro, and a big Overture are needed. Close with a simple pathetic strain. Cue sheet can be obtained from the Paralta Exchange.

Bacon-Backer Studios

Model of Construction and Utility Now in Operation—First Production in Making.

THE Bacon-Backer Film Corporation is approaching its undertaking in most propitious circumstances and under most favorable surroundings. These conclusions are derived from a visit paid to the newly constructed studios by a large party of trade newspaper men Thursday afternoon, February 14. The guests of George Backer and Gerald F. Bacon were first regaled with a luncheon, served in excellent taste, at Mr. Backer's newly opened Chatham Hotel, in Vanderbilt avenue, at Forty-eighth street.

The studios, located at 230 West Thirty-eighth street, New York, were reached after a short taxi ride, and then the party of scribes were given a surprise in the efficient equipment for taking pictures that was then revealed. The Bacon-Backer Corporation maintains that efficiency will be its first aim in production, and the centrally located studio gives evidence of a good beginning. Mr. Backer has made the construction of buildings his business for many years, and has given of his great experience his best ideas in the line he has expertly developed.

Built of brick and fireproof, within a short walk from Times Square, the Bacon-Backer studio is of three stories and equipped with every device and convenience for expediting the work of picture production. The structure is truly a model of compactness and perfection in arrangement, comfort and utility. The top floor has a "shooting" space, 92 x 40 feet, covering the entire size of the building. The lighting apparatus is complete and the last word in modern accomplishment.

The carpenter shop, property room and offices, on the ground floor, are laid out with consideration for both efficiency and convenience. The second floor is devoted to individual and chorus dressing rooms for the players. Shower baths and closets are among the conveniences, and the furnishings are in a simplicity of good taste that reflects credit upon Mr. Backer's ideas of utility and comfort. The most exacting critic would find nothing to quibble over in the construction or equipment of the new studio.

Having "house warmed" the premises under most propitious circumstances the work of actual production began the very next day, and on Sunday, February 17, Director Perry Vekroff and Cameraman Alfred H. Moses, Jr., were well into the early scenes of the first Bacon-Backer production.

SELECT ESTABLISHES NEW ORLEANS BRANCH.

In order better to take care of its enormously augmented business in that territory, Select Pictures Corporation has just opened an exchange in New Orleans. This makes the total number of Select branches throughout the United States twenty-one.

The New Orleans branch has been placed under the management of John S. Taylor, who was formerly associated with Branch Manager C. V. Ezell in Select's Dallas exchange. The new branch will take care of Mississippi and Louisiana, which heretofore had been respectively served from the Atlanta branch.

The new manager has gone out after some notable contracts, and is already well started on his way to a new record for business done in Louisiana and Mississippi. The New Orleans branch is at 718 Poydras street.

The Classification of Your Library.

MANY inquiries have been received requesting a hint or two as to the most feasible and practical method of classifying an orchestral library used for picture settings. We have made a careful study of this problem and submit the following plan, feeling that it may meet the urgent need of comprehensive cataloguing.

Mr. Herman Meyer, leader of the orchestra at the Adelphia theater, Broadway, New York, outlined his idea in a recent interview.

"I first lay out my music upon the shelves in piles, listed under the headings of Grand Opera (S), Comic Opera (A), Selections (N), Overtures (O), Ballets and Suites (B), Concert Waltzes (V), Marches (M), Popular (F), and Concert Numbers (C). Under the Popular are to be found One-Steps (P), Two-Steps (T), Fox Trots (G), Song Waltzes (L), while the Octavo size Concert numbers are separate and a letter (D) placed opposite them. The alphabetical letters in brackets are used for cataloguing purposes to save writing the complete wording. Each piece is numbered, and as I buy new music it is given the sequential number. For example, if I have 40 Grand Opera pieces, the new one will be marked (S-41); 254 Marches, the new one will be (M-255), and so on. These markings are placed upon the outer folders containing the music, and each pile is arranged according to its numerical rotation, starting from No. 1, which is at the bottom.

In conjunction with this I have catalogued alphabetically my entire library in three ways; first, according to composers; second, according to movements, and third, according to character. Under the name of each composer is listed his works, for example:

- GREIG—At Home—C-168
- A Dream—C-116
- Anitra's Dance—N-14
- Arabian Dance—N-15
- Morning—C-99
- Etc.

"Cataloguing according to movements gives me at a glance any number required under a given tempo; for example:

- ANDANTE—Andante—Mendelssohn—C-133
- Arioso—Frey—C-259
- Awakening of Spring—Bach—C-118
- Berceuse—Danby—C-12
- Broken-hearted Sparrow—Bendix—C-67
- Etc.

- ANDANTINO—Astarte—Mildenberg—C-132
- Au Matin—Godard—C-29
- Beneath the Holly—Seredy—C-149
- Consolation—Liszt—C-13
- Enchanted Hour—Mouton—C-89
- Etc.

"All the movements receive the same treatment, and by looking in this book I get any number that may seem suitable, at a glance.

"In classifying them according to character, by which I mean Dramatics, Pathetics, Semi-pathetics, Light Hurries, Large Hurries, Agitatos, Intermezcos, etc., as well as Oriental, Japanese, Chinese, Russian, Spanish, etc., I compress into one book all the music required for 'atmosphere.' It is also listed according to the alphabet. Example:

- DRAMATICS—Adagio Cantabile—Strauss—C-269
- Aria—Schumann—C-154
- Cavatina—Bohm—C-37
- L'Arlesienne—Bizet—O-29
- La Reine de Saba—Gounod—S-48
- March Torayenna—Berlioz—M-1161

- RUSSIAN—Chanson Triste—Tchaikowsky—N-46
- Cosatschoque—Dargamisky—C-192
- Gondoliera—Moskowski—C-184
- Kamenoi Ostrow—Rubenstein—C-177
- Kol Nedrei—Old Song—C-204
- Moskouskiana—Moskowski—N-79

"Of course those numbers which in themselves are classified as waltzes, waltz lentos, marches, two-steps, one-steps and fox-trots, do not enter into this catalogue, because they are perfectly listed on the shelves. Moreover, I have them in a little loose leaf memorandum book, kept for the purpose of checking up my settings to avoid repetition.

"When I first broke into the game my house manager used to come down and complain about the repetition of a number which he thought I had played the previous week. He could not hum the number for me, but insisted that I had played it. I had no proof to the contrary, but was sure that he was in the wrong. Frequently, upon investigation, after getting him to tell me the particular scene, in which the mooted piece was played, I found that it was one very similar in character and melody.

"To preclude any argument on the subject I procured a loose leaf book and entered therein every selection I possessed, listing them according to the shelving plan. I then bought a rubber date stamp and, when my setting was made up, I stamped each piano part and the corresponding number in my book with the current date. In setting up my next picture, if I came upon a piano part marked a recent date, I discarded that piece and chose something else which had not been used. I have made a practice of never repeating a number in less than eight weeks. My house manager cannot further complain because I have the proof to produce, if necessary. Of course, it means a large library to carry out this plan, but the results are well worthwhile, and from the leader's standpoint, peace of mind is large compensation in itself."

Music at the Rivoli.

For some reason we were disappointed in the music rendered during the week of February 11-18 at the Rivoli theater. Rothapfel, the genial director-general, has always been fastidious regarding his music, but, no doubt, his double duties somewhat hamper him. "Man cannot live by bread alone." No, he must get some sleep at least once a week.

Instead of the usual overture to open the program, Mr. Rothapfel offered a pair of dancers in an Esquimaux dance of aboriginal character. The idea was fine, in that it prepared the atmosphere for the scenic which followed: the lighting effects were exquisite, and the back drop, representing Artic ice-floes, was most realistic, but the dance proved amateurish and too modern to carry out the idea behind it. The absence of the overture was felt by the audience.

Miss Gladys Rice, soprano, resurrected the old favorite, "I Hear You Calling Me," which she rendered too slowly for proper interpretation. Her voice is sweet and pure, with remarkable enunciation, but lacks the warmth of feeling that must enter so largely into a song of this order.

"The Unbeliever," a feature of more than ordinary merit, received a wonderful setting. Opening with a fan-fare of trumpets and snare drums a picture of the U. S. Marines is thrown on the screen doing military drill, which draws forth much applause. During this drill the orchestra plays a snappy march, then as the picture proper fades in, "Semper Fidelis," a song dealing with the motto of the Marine Corps, is introduced. At the title, "Vive La Belgique," the Belgian National Anthem is used, and gives a wonderful effect. When the German officer is shot by the Prussian conscript the first eight bars of the Prussian National Air gives a rousing climax. The use of "Semper Fidelis" as a THEME could not possibly be improved upon, because of its meaning, "Always Faithful." It not only signified the motto of the Marines in which the hero enlisted, but characterized his attitude to a nicety.

The Criterion Male Quartette, programmed as the Rialto Quartette, did not show to the best advantage. Although their number was beautifully accompanied there was a tendency to fall away from the pitch, and the ensemble work was careless.

Mr. Arthur Depew closed the show with the March from "Tannhauser." Mr. Depew's work is too well-known for its excellence to draw any comment, except that of the highest praise.

Leaders' Service Bureau.

Questions Answered—Suggestions Offered.

Q. "I have a fifteen-piece orchestra and conductor. Recently I visited New York and noticed the large orchestras all played overtures previous to the showing of the pictures, with all 'house lights on'—a very pretty effect. If I attempted this, do you think I have enough men in my orchestra to make a good showing? How would you dress them?"

A. You have sufficient in your orchestra to adequately handle any of the standard overtures and it would be well to fall in line with the up-to-date presentation of pictures. We would suggest that you have your orchestra dressed in Tuxedos at both afternoon and night performances.

Q. "I note cue sheets are available for 'The Two-Gun Man' in 'The Bargain.' Will the other Hart releases have cue sheets too?"

A. We have been assured by the W. H. Productions, Inc., that they intend to have cue sheets on all their releases.

Q. "My orchestra is composed of saxophone, piano, violin and flute. At times they sound quite empty and thin. What change would you suggest to improve my music?"

A. The saxophone is out of place with the flute in such a small combination. Would advise using cello instead.

Q. "I have not paid the 'Music Tax' and don't intend to. I only use a pianist and she 'fakes' most of her stuff. Can the 'Society' make any claim against me if she plays from memory any of the 'Society's' copyrighted numbers?"

A. Yes. If she plays from any of their selections over eight measures you are liable to prosecution. If you will refer to our lists in recent back issues you will find over five thousand selections from which to choose.

Q. "Where can I get a first-class leader capable of taking charge of about ten to fifteen men? I want one who knows something about fitting pictures."

A. If you will write further, telling us whether you desire "Union" or "Non-Union" leader, and what you are able to pay for same, we will be pleased to supply you without any agency charge.

Q. "I have piano, violin and drums in my house orchestra. When the violinist breaks a string, he buys a new one; when the drummer breaks a drum head, he gets a new one; but the pianist is always fussing about the piano being out of tune and his not willing to have it tuned. Who should pay—the pianist or the manager?"

A. It is the usual custom for the manufacturer of a piano to keep the instrument tuned for one year, after which, the duty devolves upon the house manager.

Q. "My drummer and his wife (my pianist) have quarreled. She refuses to play with him, and when I suggested letting her out, he said he'd quit too. What would you do, fire 'em both, or just use piano?"

A. It is neither good judgment nor good business to hire a family to play in your orchestra. Would suggest firing both and hiring strangers.

Q. "My clarinet player is always off key. Is it the instrument at fault, or the man back of it?"

A. It could be both, but, in any instance, it is the player who should be held responsible.

We want the leaders to use this column. It is at your service. A personal reply is made to all questions.

Music Suggestion Synopsis.

CAST-OFF, THE (Foursquare—6 Reels).—Theme for heroine—Andante and Dramatic.

Suggest "Souvenir," Geehl; "Three Songs from Eliland," Fielitz, or "Visions," Tchaikowsky.

During the first reel two steps and light music can be used. Later a little Light Opera music will be necessary, developing gradually into the heavier stuff. In the last reel pathetic music will fill the bill. Close with the THEME, played softly. We cannot give any information regarding a possible cue sheet.

HEART OF ROMANCE, THE (Fox—5 Reels).—Theme for heroine and hero—Andante.

Suggest "Arioso," Frey; "Intermezzo," Whelpley, or "Romance," Rubenstein.

A human story with little dramatic interest. Light numbers will predominate. Cue sheets can be obtained from Fox exchanges.

HIDDEN PEARLS, THE (Paramount—5 Reels).—Theme for the hero—Moderato and of Hawaiian Atmosphere.

Suggest "Aloha Oe," native song; "Admiration," Tapers, or "Luana Waltz," Rogers.

This is big stuff all through, and will be difficult to fit. The atmosphere must be held throughout, and as a consequence proper music must be used. The following list of selections may be helpful:

"Leo Idoles"—Valse Lento—Allier.
 "Chanson Indine"—Andantino—Bemberg.
 "An Indian Legend"—Andante—Baron.
 "Kahola Honolulu"—March—Lake.
 "Granada"—Two-Step—Jose Lou.
 "Hawaiiana"—One-Step—Kaiulana.
 "Mele Hula"—Dance—Tyers.
 "Call of the Woods"—Moderato—Tyers.
 "Maori"—Andante—Tyers.
 "Lola's Dream"—Andantino—Tolani.

JACK SPURLOCK, PRODIGAL (Fox—5 Reels).—Theme for hero—Fox Trot.

Suggest "Bedouin Girl," Romberg; "Free and Easy," Berger, or "Hi Ho Hum," Isel.

This is a five-reel comedy requiring light music. Many One-Steps and Fox Trots are necessary. A Valse Lento can be used in reel three, and a light "Hurry" in reel five. Close with the THEME. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Fox exchanges.

JILTED JANET (American—5 Reels).—Theme for the heroine—Allegretto.

Suggest "Legend of a Rose," Reynard; "Musidora," Leigh, or "Serenade," Frommell.

The humorous phase of this picture stands out strongly, and should be treated with daintiness in keeping with Janet's personality. A couple of "Misteriosos," one light "Hurry," and a few Valse Lentos amid a number of Allegros and Intermezzos will play the picture. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Mutual exchanges.

KEYS OF THE RIGHTFOUS, THE (Paramount—5 Reels).—Theme for heroine—Allegretto.

Suggest "Coquette," Johnstone; "Serenade," Lange Miller, or "A Little Story," Lack.

Open with a Pastoral, followed by THEME. Light stuff and "Adagio Pathetique," by Godard, fill the first reel. The entire plot is semi-dramatic. Note the direct cue for "Evening Star," Wagner, in the second reel. One Agitato and one "Hurry" are needed to go with many Andantes, both dramatic and pathetic. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paramount exchanges.

LES MISERABLES (Fox—9 Reels).—Theme for Jean Val Jean—Plaintive Andante.

Suggest "Serenade," Tittl; "Souvenir," Oerman, or "Visions," Tchaikowsky.

There are nine reels to this picture, and the leader will do well to see it, if possible, before attempting his musical setting. The first reel is intensely dramatic (note gunshots), closing with a Religioso. The second reel can be played throughout by the first movement of Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony." The third, fourth and fifth are also dramatic, with a couple of pathetic spots to fill in. The sixth and seventh lighten up a bit, while the last two reels abound in big stuff. Many overtures are necessary. Grand Operatic numbers can be used and many Dramatic Agitatos and "Hurrys." Cue sheets can be obtained from the Fox exchanges.

MORGAN'S RAIDERS (Bluebird—5 Reels).—Theme for heroine—Allegretto.

Suggest "Chanson Sans Parole," Tchaikowsky; "Love in Arcady," Wood, or "Moonlight Dance," Finck.

This is a civil war story abounding in patriotism. Choose Southern melodies such as "Dixie," "Battle Hymn of the Republic," "Tramp, Tramp, Tramp, the Boys Are Marching," etc.

MY WIFE (Mutual—5 Reels).—Theme for heroine—Allegretto.

Suggest "Capricious Annette," Borch; "Caressing Butterfly," Barthelmy, or "Idillio," Lack.

Light music will predominate in this picture—use melodious stuff. In the fourth reel there is a Pastoral, Dramatic Tension, and Agitato needed. Some pathetic stuff follows. Finish with the THEME. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Mutual exchanges.

OUR LITTLE WIFE (Goldwyn—5 Reels).—Theme for heroine—Moderato.

Suggest "Eleanor," Deppen; "La Coquette," Onivas; "Romance," Mericanto.

This picture is light, and must be treated with Intermezzos, Allegros and Allegrettos. Use dainty stuff, "La Boheme" selection will fit well for some scenes. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Goldwyn exchanges.

PETTICOAT PILOT, A (Paramount—5 Reels).—Theme—Adantino.

Suggest "Esperanza," Johnston; "Au Matin," Godard, or "Consolation," Liszt.

This is a story of Cape Cod life. It is a simple and human plot that requires like musical treatment. "Scotch Poem," MacDowell; "By the Sea," Faunot; "Barcarolle," Tchaikowsky; "A Norfolk Folk Tune," Wood, will fit. Note the need of a hymn at the end of the second reel. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paramount exchanges.

GEORGE BALSODN'S GOOD SEND OFF.

Before starting on a six months' leave of absence, to serve in the Y. M. C. A.'s foreign department, George Balsdon, late manager of Vitagraph's exchange in the Mecca Building, was given substantial evidence of his popularity in the trade. Officers and executives of the Vitagraph presented him with a handsome gold watch and chain, and members of the F-I-L-M Club slipped upon his finger a solid gold Masonic ring to remember them by. Mr. Balsdon's knowledge of the picture game will serve well our boys in France, and he will come back to a job with the Vitagraph.

LEO F. LEVISON JOINS SELECT.

Leo F. Levison has been chosen by Select Pictures Corporation to become manager of the company's exchange in Pittsburgh, succeeding Harvey B. Day, who has resigned that post in order to go into business for himself. Mr. Levison entered upon his duties as branch manager February 19.

In the Pittsburgh territory there is not a more experienced man than Leo Levison, who has for some years been one of the most prominent exchange managers in Pittsburgh. In order to accept his present position Mr. Levison resigned as branch manager of Pathe in Pittsburgh. Prior to his connection with Pathe Mr. Levison was employed by other concerns, among them the World Film, over whose Pittsburgh branch he had charge during 1914 and 1915.

LEIGHTON OSMUN WRITING FOR METRO.

Leighton Graves Osmun, author of numerous motion picture successes, as well as novels and short stories, has joined the scenario department of Metro as a staff writer, and has made his first contribution, "Treasure," an original story brimful of action, in which Edith Storey, Metro star, will shortly be seen. Mr. Osmun is another of the well known authors won over to the screen and before being engaged by the Metro Pictures Corporation had established a reputation with the Famous Players-Lasky Company.

Besides writing "Treasure" as a vehicle for the talents of Edith Storey, Mr. Osmun assisted in the preparation of the continuity of "The Claim," in which Miss Storey has the stellar role. "The Claim," an elaborate Metro production, has been completed and is soon to be released.

Demand the Best in Cue Sheets.

TODAY nearly every producer of any consequence is giving musical service to his exhibitors in the form of cue sheets. Once in a while specially written score is provided and duly appreciated, but in view of the many releases and the result "Eleventh Hour" rush to get them out cue sheets have proved more feasible. The day will come and is fast approaching when no feature picture will be released without a score to further portray the gamut of emotions in the silent drama.

With few exceptions the producers do not understand music sufficiently to pass criticism. They procure a musician whom they believe, through hearsay or good repute, to be the man most capable of taking care of this most important branch of present day film service, and turn the entire work over to him without supervision. Some have been most fortunate in their selection, and the benefits derived are shown by added box office receipts to the exhibitor and increased bookings to the exchange. Others less fortunate have continued to give inadequately a service which they believed to be the best, but which actually proved to be a travesty of the picture rather than a portrayal. Moreover, some recognized musicians have essayed this work, and like the proverbial "new broom" swept clean at the start only to slump into a well beaten rut, as their new born enthusiasm waned. Consequently we find their cue sheets pretty much the same for every picture they review. Same numbers, same variety, same manner of handling cues, same quantity, and same quality throughout.

There is a strong tendency on the part of exhibitors to refrain from being classed "a knocker"—this is a laudable stand. Since he has to "kick" and fight for almost everything pertaining to his picture theater before he gets it, and, as yet, music does not take precedence over Advertising, Publicity, Lighting, Ventilation, Projection, etc., he feels that he can blame the leader, and let it go at that.

This is gravely unjust to the leader, and equally unfair to the producer. Besides, it does not show a brotherly spirit toward your neighbor, who may be a sufferer also. The leader must perforce continue to use the badly suggested music, the producer is kept in ignorance regarding the service for which he is paying, your fellow exhibitor continues to suffer, while the person responsible for the trouble blissfully draws his stipend for careless and slovenly work. Producers will welcome a "kick," and be more than pleased if you can constructively criticize the cue sheets. Ask your leader what suggestions he has to offer, and embody these in your letter. You will be surprised at the quick results obtained, for the producer of to-day has his ear to the ground, and is really anxious to adjust and correct reasonable "kicks."

A few of the flagrant faults of cue sheets might be mentioned and prove a guide to you in your judgment. In the first place, where you find one that suggests music almost exclusively from one publishing house you can gamble that the writer is either subsidized, or is, possibly, only familiar with that particular brand of music. No single publisher has a library comprehensive enough to fill the demands of the picture industry. The smaller the library, the more frequent will be the repetition of numbers. Certain publishing houses are issuing cue sheets of their own, with the object of obtaining a lucrative avenue of sales. This is bound to have a baleful influence upon the cue sheet, and becomes a means to an end without accomplishing its mission. The suggested numbers will not be selected for their suitability, but for pushing the sales of their own publications.

No good cue sheet should contain more than two or three so-called "photoplay numbers." If these are used to any degree of frequency they become monotonous and meaningless. There are occasions where they are absolutely essential, and fit the scene beautifully, especially dramatic tension stuff of which there is little to be obtained elsewhere. But when these "Photoplay Series" are forced into every situation their true value is lost, and it is made most difficult for an up-to-date leader to substitute something that will fit.

Many writers of cue sheets have their "pet" numbers, which are the "old stand-bys" found in every musical suggestion sheet. There is no gainsaying the fact that in the majority of cases these are real live selections, but, because of too frequent use, die a natural death. Beware of "pet" music, and caution your leader lest he, too, take it into his bosom and nurse it as his "pet." You can be assured that it will find little favor with the audience if they play it every week.

Suggested numbers must be in the atmosphere of the picture. If it be Oriental, and only three Oriental numbers are found in the cue sheet, there is something wrong with the brain of the compiler. At the same time it is just as erroneous to quote Oriental music for atmosphere that has nothing of the Orient in it. When a number is mis-suggested it becomes evident that one of two things has occurred, either the writer did not see the scene and his assistant misguided him, or he has never heard the number in question, and is judging it by the tempo or the name. Yet once in a while one finds a number such as "An Indian Legend," Baron, which in very name signifies the Orient, suggested for a placid scene laid in "dear old England—Bah, Jove!" A case of this kind is beyond comprehension.

Too many numbers spoil a musical setting; contrawise, too few. When this happens the orchestra leader is hard put to it to add sufficient music to obviate the repetition of each number. Of the two faults, the former contains the lesser evil.

Cue sheets that repeat more than one number (as the THEME) are neither practical or feasible in small combinations. Cue sheets are apically intended to benefit the smaller exhibitor, and thus one containing two, three, four, five or more numbers which are repeated is defeating its own purpose. In some cases where the compiler is a practical musician and takes thought for the "turns" a selection can be repeated. For example, No. 16 is "Ave Maria," Gounod, then the THEME is played as No. 17. Now, because the Gounod number is open in front of them the players would have no difficulty in repeating it as No. 18. If desirable, the picture can be closed with the opening selection, as it simply means one "turn" back to the beginning. Thus No. 1 can be repeated as No. 38, the last number.

There are no tricks or professional secrets in the preparing of cue sheets. It requires brains, a wide knowledge of musical literature, a deductive mind, and a keen insight to the practical needs of the average exhibitor. These are the attributes and qualifications which the producer believes he is buying. If they are not represented in the service he is providing for you tell him about it, and there will be no question about his attitude in the matter.

Nazimova Music at the Lyric.

"Revelation," a superb photoplay now running at the Lyric, contains some wonderful opportunities for good music, and Mr. George Rubinstein, who set the music, has not allowed all of them to slip by. He has many beautiful selections most appropriately fitted, but we cannot understand why he opens the picture with a Spanish number as the location is in France and the scene, a cafe. The natural supposition would prevail in the minds of the audience that they were about to view a picture holding Spanish atmosphere. Just as the prelude or overture to an opera is indicative of what is to follow so should the first selection be symbolic of the anticipated atmosphere. As the music continued through the dance we guessed that it pertained thereto but even that predication was wrong for it happened to be a Grecian Classic and could not possibly be mistaken for a Spanish fandango.

Three minutes of studio scene showing Nazimova posing as "Salome" with no "Salome" music thereto; monks in the cloister and no religious music; the salutation of Napoleon and nothing patriotic; the American flag discovered and saluted by the heroine and again nothing to indicate it in the music; all these can be forgiven as oversights or lack of time and because of the fact that there was no attempt at synchrony it would be most difficult to catch these details. But when a title indicating a lapse of time is disregarded, and the same selection continued into the next scene, when change of location occurs and the music changeth not; when a hurry is played where the scene obviously requires a pathetic, one loses this sense of forgiveness, and prefers to err humanly rather than be divine. This music could not, with the greatest possible stretch of imagination, be classed as a score. It is a good musical setting with all the limitations of such. For a theater charging $1.00 per seat as its top price it is shamefully inadequate.

Two themes are necessary, an Allegretto for the heroine and a Moderato for the American hero.

Suggest.—Allegretto, "Chiffonette," by Atherton, or "The Legend of a Rose," by Reynard.

Moderato, "The Land of Dreams," by Driffil, or "Canzonetta," by D'Ambrosia.

You will need bright French stuff for the first five reels, intermezzos, light waltzes and serenades. Note the fight in the studio between the model and Nazimova. This is short, but requires big dramatic treatment. Would suggest "Prelude" from "Romeo and Juliet," by Gounod. For the monks and cloister scenes would suggest "Kamenoi Ostrow," by Rubinstein, while pastoral music is needed during her flight from her former lover. Little dramatic music is necessary throughout the entire picture, but toward the end we are shown a little fighting "at the front," with its attendant dying and suffering soldiers. Hospital scenes also will require pathos, and the picture should close triumphantly, as the hero and heroine are married at the monastery after she has been decorated with the medal for her bravery. Excerpts from "La Boheme," by Puccini, will fit the studio scenes, and don't forget "Salome" for the posing scene. This picture deserves the best possible musical setting, as it truly is a big feature in every way. Get a viewing before the first performance if possible in order to properly present it.

Music at the Strand.

During the week commencing February 24, Mr. Edel, the genial managing director, provided a musical program that in many respects excelled anything we have heard in some time. The overture alone was well worth price of admission. Mr. Spireccu, wielding the baton for this number—"Scheherazade," by Rimsky-Korsakov—wielded it well. The entire suite was not given, but lost nothing in the cutting because of its beautiful interpretation and wonderful rendition. The Strand Symphony Orchestra merits much praise for even essaying such a work, aside from delivering it in such a facile manner.

Opening the Topical Review we disliked to hear "Onward Christian Soldiers" played with such a fast tempo. It was almost "Jiggy" and took away the inherent dignity of this beautiful march.

Miss Mabel Beddoe sang "The Pipes of Gordan's Men," a song written for and suitable to a baritone. Needless to say it stirred little patriotic fervor. Then followed the scenic. Mr. Carl Eduarde never fails to make his music interesting in the scenic, and this was no exception. A duet for French horn and flute was rendered smoothly and effectively. The big fault was its brevity. Why not have the organist pick it up and finish it with the picture?

The second movement of McDowell's "D Minor Concerto" for piano and orchestra was well played by Mr. Daniel Wolfe. He showed marked technique and, for a first performance, acquitted himself admirably.

Herbert Waterous, the well-known basso, demonstrated that he has lost nothing of that beautiful velvety quality of tone that has made him a favorite for so many years. Especially was it noticeable in his rendition of "Annie Laurie," "Invictus," by Huhn, his first number, had all the necessary "fire," while the interpretation and enunciation left nothing to be desired.

Musical Suggestion Synopsis.

BANDIT AND THE PREACHER, THE (W. H. Productions, Inc.—Five Reels)—Theme A for the Bandit—Dramatic; theme B for the Preacher—Religioso. Suggest for the Bandit "Romance"—Frommel; and for the Preacher, "Love Song"—Fleigler, or "Intermezzo"—Bizet.

This is a typical Western drama of the truly Hart variety. You will need many dramatic numbers, lots of "hurrys" and agitados, a couple of pathetics, and one amoroso. Cue sheets can be obtained from the W. H. Productions, Inc.

BROADWAY BILL (Yorke Metro—Five Reels)—Theme for the Hero—Moderato. Suggest "Elysian Dreams"—Rinland; "Legend"—Friml, or "Martique"—Lorraine.

This picture is chock full of love scenes. You will require many sentimental ballads. Note the fist fight in the camp, the rescue of the little boy, and provide for these a hurry and agitato, respectively. You will also need a few Pastoral numbers to portray the atmosphere of the great woods. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Metro exchange.

CAVANAUGH OF THE FOREST RANGERS (Blue Ribbon—Five Reels)—Theme for the Hero—Allegretto. Suggest "Canzonetta"—D'Ambrosio; "Idillio"—Lack, or "Intermezzo"—Granados.

Pastorale music in quantities will be needed. Some Western stuff, a few one-steps and fox trots, a couple of pathetics and three hurrys. These, with a filling of bright intermezzos, will play the picture. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Vitagraph exchange.

DADDY'S GIRL (Gold Rooster—Five Reels)—Theme for Baby Osborne—Andante. Suggest "Pleading"—Wood; "Heart's Desire"—Losey, or "Lullaby"—Foley.

Play "Konigskinder" opera and choose the balance of setting with a view to light stuff. There is room for a fox trot in the cabaret scene, and "A Day with the Circus"—Lampe, will just suit the miniature circus stunts. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Pathe exchanges.

FLASH OF FATE, THE (Universal—Five Reels)—Theme for Hero—Andante. Suggest "Dialogue"—Meyer Helmund; "Elysium"—Speaks, or "A Little Song"—Erdody.

This is pure melodrama. Many "hurrys" and agitados are needed. Music typical of the "submerged tenth" will fit beautifully. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Universal exchange.

FORBIDDEN PATH, THE (Fox—Six Reels)—Theme for Nelly—Andante. Suggest "Astarte"—Mildenberg; "Salut D'Amour"—Elgar; "Melodie"—Lederer.

Note organ solo in the first reel when girl plays, followed by Andante music in the second. You will need a fox-trot in the fourth and piano solo in the fifth. The balance of the picture is made up of big situations requiring very heavy music. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Fox exchange.

HER ROYAL HIGHNESS (World—Five Reels)—Theme for the Hero—Moderato. Suggest "Land of Dreams"—Duffl; "Melodie"—Friml, or "Serenade"—Schubert.

Opens with Harvard stuff—use college melodies. French atmosphere follows, requiring a big agitato for the fight in the cafe. An Apache dance can also be used in this part. The remaining footage is taken up with Royalty stuff. "Pomp and Circumstance," by Elgar, would be appropriate, followed by light music. Cue sheet can be obtained from the World exchange.

IT PAYS TO EXERCISE (Paramount Comedy—Two Reels)—No theme. This is a comedy requiring light opera selections, potpourri stuff and the usual one-steps, two-steps and fox trots. No cue sheet available.

LITTLE RED DECIDES (Triangle—Five Reels)—Theme for Boy—Andantino. Suggest "Serenade"—Jeffery; "Tendre Aveu"—Schutt, or "Yesterlove"—Borch.

Dainty stuff is required here with a touch of Western flavor. Some pathetic numbers are needed, and light music will play the picture. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Triangle exchange.

MIDNIGHT TRAIL, THE (Mutual—Five Reels)—Theme—Allegretto. Suggest "Legend of a Rose"—Reynard; "Mignonette"—Friml, or "Idillio"—Lack.

The opening requires a misterioso and dramatic tension. Then fox-trots, one-steps, etc., for almost a reel. There are few dramatic situations, but note the sleep-walking episode and fit it with weird music. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Mutual exchange.

MORAL LAW, THE (Fox—Five Reels)—Theme for Hero—Andante. Suggest "Don Jose Aria" from Carmen; or "Carmena"—Wilson.

Picture begins very Spanish, but light through the first reel. Misteriosos, dramatics and agitados are required for the second and third, with a "hurry" and galop thrown in for good measure. The fourth part lightens up a bit, requiring serenades and intermezzos, and in the fifth you will need dramatic music entirely. Note the wedding scene and use "Lohengrin"; close with the theme. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Fox exchange.

ONE MORE AMERICAN (Paramount—Five Reels)—Theme for Hero—Andantino and Italian. Suggest "Maria Mari"—di Capua; "O Sole Mio"—di Capua.

The flavor of this music should be largely Italian, mostly light in character. There are some dramatic hits in the second and fourth reels. Have "The Dance of the Marionettes" handy for theater scene. Cue sheet can be obtained from Paramount exchange.

POWERS THAT PREY (Mutual—Five Reels)—Theme for Hero—Allegretto. Suggest "Babilage"—de Castillo; "Dance of the Moths"—Weidt, or "Caressing Butterfly"—Bartholmy.

This picture has many big moments requiring heavy stuff. You will require many numbers on the romance style, a few agitados, two big "hurrys" and a strong pathetic. The remainder of the picture requires "trippy" music. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Mutual exchange.

REVELATION (Metro—Seven Reels)—See "Music for 'Revelation'" elsewhere in this department.

RUGGLES OF RED GAP (Essanay—Seven Reels)—Theme A for Holmes—Moderato; theme B for Kate Kenner—Andantino. Suggest for Holmes, "Will You Remember?"—Romberg, or "You're in Love"—Friml; while for Kate Kenner, "The Vampire"—Levy, or "Extase D'Amour"—Roze.

The picture opens in England, turns to Paris and then comes to western America for its atmosphere. Note these locations and play music suitable to the occasion. Light stuff will play the entire production. There are no dramatic situations. Use one-steps, fox-trots, light opera, waltzes and intermezzos. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Perfection Pictures exchange.

SPURS OF SYBIL, THE (World—Five Reels)—Theme for Heroine—Moderato and dainty. Suggest "Bowl of Pansies"—Reynard; "Canzonetta"—Nicode, or "Chiffonette"—Atherton.

There is little drama shown in this feature. It can be played with light music throughout. Cue sheet can be obtained from the World exchange.

UNBELIEVER, THE (Edison—Eight Reels)—Theme for Hero—Moderato. Suggest "Semper Fidelis"—Webb; "At Sunset"—Breuer, or "Cavina"—Eohm.

This is a war picture of very human interest. Opening with a pastoral religioso, it proceeds to moderato. A pathetic occurs in the first reel when the old German servitor received the news of the death of his son. Marches follow when the marines are drilling. Battle agitados follow with a misterioso and allegretto in rotation. Dramatic music at the cue, "In the sector," followed by the Belgian National Hymn at T, "Vive la Belgique." Next you will need more battle stuff, some pathetic music, and at the cue T, "Remember Herr Lieutenant," the Prussian National Air. The remainder of the picture requires dramatic and pathetic stuff. Close with the theme. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Perfection Pictures exchange.

Questions Answered—Suggestions Offered.

Q. In preparing my setting for the pictures, following the suggestions offered in the cue sheets, I find it necessary to bring my orchestra to a full stop before going into the next number, which makes the music sound punk in spots, especially when the scene calls for only a minute or minute and a half of any one special number. What would you suggest to overcome this?

A. There is no way of overcoming the sudden stops if you are forced to use cue sheets, but with a little forethought you so gauge the tempo of the number that you can end at a cadence and the change will be less noticeable from the standpoint of the audience.

Q. I am a leader of a small orchestra in a small town. Frequently, some of the natives who have gone to New York and returned come to me and ask me to play "Jazz," or to "Jazz" some of the "Rags." I don't know exactly what they mean. Maybe you can help me.

A. Recently in the restaurants of the East, a new combination of instruments have been used to play dance music. An orchestra, comprising piano, violin or clarinet, cornet, trombone or saxophone and drums, blares out ragtime music and goes under the name of "a jazz band." This instrumentation is not effective for pictures and would drive your patrons away if attempted.

Q. What do you think of the idea of playing selections throughout a reel? Take, for instance, "The Fortune Teller"; this selection provides a number of movements and some very popular numbers, such as The Gypsy Love Song. I find the patrons of this theater rather like the selections from the light operas, although the music is not always appropriate to the picture.

A. Many of the best theaters follow this idea in the fitting of light comedies, or comedy dramas, and find it meets with much success. Do not try it for the feature.

"Music Service for the Exhibitor."

A WELL-KNOWN producer confessed to us the other day that he did not know the difference between a score, a setting or a cue sheet, and supplemented the remark by saying he did not believe one producer in ten knew what he was paying for in the matter of the much-abused term, "Music Service for the Exhibitor."

For the information of exhibitor, producer and orchestra leaders, we will try to classify specifically all forms of music pertinent to "Fitting the Pictures."

MUSICAL SCORE—A musical score is a compilation of either original or standard music, prepared in synchrony with each and every dominant scene of the picture, carrying throughout themes and counter-themes to denote the characters portrayed on the screen. Each number should be in key sequence and arranged in such a manner that there be no obvious break during the playing of the entire score. They must of necessity be short, and for that reason requires varied orchestral treatment to avoid monotony. Many occasions arise where there are two characters in the foreground, and two themes must be blended together, showing two emotions at one and the same time. Frequently a standard number must be changed in tempo and rhythm to convey the proper idea. Special legitimate effects sometimes must be arranged by the use of the orchestral instruments themselves to obviate shoddiness. All these things call for superb orchestration and a thorough knowledge of instrumentation. A real musical score requires almost as much ingenuity, careful thought and untiring efforts as an opera score, for in every way it meets the same obstacles, which must be overcome. The scores for "The Birth of a Nation," "Ramona," "Civilization," "Intolerance," or "Peer Gynt," will live and continue to be classed as epochs in the picture industry. These are prepared only for the big run features.

MUSICAL SETTING—A musical setting is comprised of standard selections placed loosely, in rotation, in a folder, for the purpose of fitting a picture. There is no synchrony, and because of that fact, no key sequence is considered, for it may happen that where the break occurs the key will fit the following number perfectly. For practical purposes one theme only is used, although it is sometimes feasible to use two. This music cannot possibly fit every foot of the picture, but can hold the atmosphere in a general way and carry the picture. These are used in every theater and are frequently prepared by the aid of cue sheets.

MUSICAL CUE SHEET—A musical cue sheet is a prepared list of cues, indicating where the music should be changed, and suggesting certain selections which are suitable for use, with the tempo and character of each noted to allow for substitution. The approximate time is shown, and sometimes a three-word description of the scene to be fitted is given. Cue sheets are distributed by the picture producers for the benefit of the exhibitor who cannot procure his film in time to see it before the first performance, and are good, bad, or indifferent, according to the ability displayed by the writer of them.

MUSICAL SUGGESTION SYNOPSIS is a concise musical review of the picture with suggested numbers that may be used as a theme. Atmosphere, period of time, location and big moments are noted, and frequently selections are mentioned for use in the climaxes.

At the present time of writing, the above is a complete classification of music for the pictures. The rapid growth of the industry, bringing with it new ideas, may cause changes to be made in the method of musical presentation, but now we can only rely on four forms denoting picture accompaniment.

The importance of music as an adjunct to the picture has been but recently recognized, and there is considerable confusion in the minds of producer, exhibitor and layman regarding its classification. By definition, example and qualifications, we have tried to standardize music for the pictures in order that the producer will not be further mulcted by unscrupulous arrangers, and exhibitors will know what they are getting when called by its proper name.

Scores and settings are frequently regarded as one, and the same thing and capital is made out of it by those fakers who throw together loose music and demand score prices for it. In many respects the two are alike; they are played as an accompaniment and must fit the picture. The difference lies in the necessary qualifications required by each.

A score must follow the picture minutely, foot by foot, as an accompaniment follows the voice. It must be in perfect synchrony. By this we mean that if a dominant scene has a footage of 150 feet, and the film projection calls for 15 minutes to the thousand feet, the appropriate selections should run exactly two minutes and fifteen seconds. Naturally the number of measures required will be governed by the tempo selected. An adagio or andante sostenuto number will not be as long as an allegro or allegretto. The following examples, indicative of the time duration of fifteen seconds, will show a marked difference, and by using these as a basis, one can readily understand how an entire score can be in absolute synchrony.

A score must have key sequence—in other words, each successive number must be in a relative key to the one immediately preceding it. As students of harmony well know, there are five relatives to every key, so the task is not so great as would appear on the surface. Besides using the legitimate relatives, it is permissible to use an enharmonic key, or one which begins with a note common in the chord of the preceding key; for example: Going from the key of F to the key of A major, we find A is the third of the chord in the key of F, and is also the tonic of the key of A. The best results are obtained when they finish and begin.

At (A) you will notice the upper A is held in common, the F falls one-half tons, and the C rises one-half tone, while at (B) these progressions similarly obtain, but in different voices.

The following examples of enharmonic keys are the only ones available and must be used judiciously lest discord appear in the change: 1—5 flats, key of Db, has for its enharmonic 7 sharps, key of C sharp 2—6 flats, key of Gb, has for its enharmonic 6 sharps, key of F sharp 6—7 flats, key of Cb, has for its enharmonic 5 sharps, key of B and vice versa.

The following table of relative flat keys is worked out in the sharp keys in exactly the same manner.

		C
Relatives	G E min.		F D min.
Key		F
Relatives	C A min.		Bb G min.
Key		Bb
Relatives	F D min.		Eb C min.
Key		Eb
Relatives	Bb G min.		A# F min.
Key		A#
Relatives	Eb C min.		Eb Bb min.
Key		F min. Db
Relatives	A# F min.		Gb Eb min.
Key		Bb min. Gb
Relatives	Db min.		Eb min. Cb min.
Key		Eb min. Cb
Relatives	Gb Eb min.		A# min. E major Db min.

Our contention is not that these keys should be used in sequence, and selection made with this in mind only. By no means. A number must first be selected for its suitability alone, and then if it does fall within the rule for key sequence, it should be transposed to a key relative to the preceding number. Before deciding the key for transposition, the orchestration should be carefully scrutinized lest a key be selected that will carry some instrument out of its range. This would be calamitous and make the work of transposition absolutely abortive. Where there appears to be no key suitable for transposition, it is better to write an original modulation for approximately a fifteen-second length. This should be tacked on the end of the preceding number and not used at the cue for the next number. Of course, allowance should be made for it in the timing.

The qualifications required for a musical setting are by no means so exacting, nor do they entail such minute detail or painstaking effort. It must fit the picture in a general way and portray the big emotions depicted. No special orchestral arranging is necessary, no blending of themes is possible, nor is key sequence counted upon to work out satisfactorily. Synchrony is not attempted; the principal problem is simply to fit the picture with standard music. This form of musical accompaniment is not a score and must not be classed as such.

Turning from the playable music to the suggestion sheets, remarkable as it may seem, we frequently see producing companies advertise their cue sheets as scores. This is misleading to the exhibitor and his orchestra leader, and is most detrimental to the company itself.

The difference between the cue sheet suggestions and the musical suggestion synopsis is again the difference between detail and generality. In both cases the picture must be seen in order to suggest proper music, but when a cue sheet must be prepared, it entails the use of a stop-watch to catch the time, a stenographer to get the titles, and an assistant to note the effects. When the data has been obtained, each number must be selected with care, looking to its suitability, and practicability, for small combinations, as well as for its probable existence in the library of the average orchestra leader. Of course, the tempo being given, he has a chance to substitute if he deems it wise, and this is made easy because of the given time duration. Cue sheets are sent out when no score is prepared, and from them the leader can compile his musical setting.

Many leaders prefer to disregard cue sheets for some reason or other, and yet they require some idea of the picture they must fit. These fellows used to read the reviews of the pictures in question and thus learn its general trend. As an aid to this class of musicians, the musical suggestion synopsis was adopted and has received many high commendations for its brevity and conciseness. It is also an aid to those leaders who have been neglected by the exchange, or whose cue sheet has been delayed in the mails. It suggests the music required in a general way and leaves to the judgment of the orchestra conductor the proper presentation of his picture.

Music service in any form is absolutely essential to the up-to-date theater, and every producer should see to it that he is getting the service he is paying for under its proper classification.

Music at the Rialto.

During the week commencing March 3 we visited the "Temple of the Motion Picture," and as far as a critic is permitted to enjoy anything, we drank our fill of good music.

The overture, "Capriccio Italien," by Tschalkowsky, was immense. Hugo Reisenfeld has never done a better bit of conducting. His tempi were most accurate, and his interpretation showed a thorough grasp of the composer's intention.

Miss Annie Rosmer sang "The Bird Song" from "I Pagliacci," but failed to give it birdlike notes. She was decidedly ill at ease and possessed the amateurish habit of beating time, not only with her feet, but legs, body, head and shoulder swayed rhythmically. As a dance the song proved interesting. Not satisfied with one selection from this opera of Leoncavallo, M. Desire La Salle rendered the Prologue with a beautiful quality of tone. His voice is exceptionally good and there was no need of flunking the A flat in the finish. Probably nervousness forced him to take the F instead. As this is not traditional it spoils the finale and loses for him much applause that he really deserves.

We could not understand the inconsistency of costuming the lady and then having the Prologue sung in evening dress. Why not have the entire performance a costume affair since the Rialto chorus also appeared in the peasant regalia seen in the streets of Italy.

This number, "Funiculi-Funicula," was well put over. The singing was distinctly enunciated and the costumes atmospheric. As a sequel to the picture "One More American," featuring George Beban, it was most appropriate. It is just this little artistic touch that makes the Rialto so popular, and there is no question that Dr. Reisenfeld's directing has its drawing power. In fact, he is too good. When his assistant takes the baton the difference is so apparent the audience feels sorry for the poor fellow.

The feature was well fitted, but lacked the American-Italian flavor and seemed a bit "choppy." The muted trumpet call of "The Star Spangled Banner" was a bright idea, but when on one occasion the player fell asleep and missed his cue, the attention of the audience was forcibly called to it by the snapping fingers of the conductor. Better lose the effect than detract from the picture in this manner. Take the offender out after the performance and "shoot him at sunrise" if you wish, but don't chastise the patrons and belittle the player.

Musical Suggestion Synopsis.

ANN'S FINISH (Mutual—Five Reels)—No theme necessary. This picture is dramatic. Open with a couple of light melodious numbers, then follow with misteriosos and dramatic tension music. You will need a few agitados and a couple of good "hurrys," a sad number just before closing, and a bright selection to finish. Your "fill-ins" must be big to carry the picture. Cue sheet can be obtained from the Mutual exchange.

BELOVED TRAITOR, THE (Goldwyn—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Andantino. Suggest "Extase D'Amour"—Roze; "A Dream"—Borch, or "A Deep Sea Romance"—Lake.

The story deals with the depth of love for a man. There are no dramatic moments in the picture. One agitato is needed for the rescue of the father from the sea, and would suggest "Scotch Poem"—MacDowell, as most fitting. The entire selection of "The Pearl Fishers" can be used nicely. A Valse Caprice is needed in the last reel for the ballroom scene. Pastorales will fit many situations showing extorters. Cue sheet can be obtained from the Goldwyn exchange.

GIRL WITH THE CHAMPAGNE EYES (Fox—Five Reels)—Theme—A Melodious pastorella. Suggest "A Shepherd's Tale"—Nevin; "Nymphs and Fairies"—Bemberg, or "Murmuring Zephyrs"—Jensen.

You will need plaintive music in abundance, some dramatic tensions and agitados, with a few misteriosos. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Fox exchange.

GREAT ADVENTURE, THE (Pathe—Five Reels)—Theme for Heroine—Moderato. Suggest "Adieu"—Kargsnoff; "Serenade"—Chaminade, or "Starlight"—Zulueta.

A comedy-drama requiring light treatment. An agitato is needed for the rescue scene. Some light opera selections will also fit in nicely. Cue sheet can be obtained from the Pathe exchange.

HEIRESS FOR A DAY (Triangle—Five Reels)—Theme for Heroine—Andante. Suggest "Elysium"—Speaks; "Lullaby"—Foley, or "Extase"—Ganne.

The music should be light—two popular waltzes, two popular two-steps, and a fox trot are needed. In the last reel note the ballroom scene and a bit of dramatic action. Cue sheet can be obtained from the Triangle exchange.

LIGHT WITHIN, THE (Petrova—Five Reels)—Theme for Heroine—Andante Moderato. Suggest "Arloso"—Frey; "Meditation"—Deismaa, or "Romance"—Wieniawsky.

The picture is big, and needs careful treatment. Pathetics abound, and dramatic music is much needed. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Petrova Picture Co.

MARRIAGE BUBBLE, THE (Triangle—Five Reels)—Theme—Andante. Suggest "Reverie"—Vieuxtemp; "Romance"—Rubenstein, or "Souvenir"—Geehl.

Melody is needed in this picture. Two dramatic selections and a pathetic will fit nicely. Note the fire scene in the last reel. Cue sheet can be obtained from the Triangle exchange.

ROUGH LOVER, THE (Bluebird—Five Reels)—Theme for Helen—Dainty Moderato. Suggest "In Poppyland"—Albers; "Eleanor"—Deppen, or "Roses and Memories"—Arthur.

Light music will fit the picture with a sprinkling of weird misterioso stuff for the seance scenes. Cue sheet can be obtained from the Universal exchange.

SHOES THAT DANCED (Triangle—Five Reels)—Theme—Andante Suggest "Intermezzo"—Whelpley; "Heart's Desire"—Losey, or "Love Song"—Flegler.

Light music, fox trots, two-steps, popular songs, waltz intermezzos and a few light misteriosos will fit the picture. Cue sheet can be obtained from the Triangle exchange.

SIX SHOOTING ANDY (Fox—Five Reels)—Theme for Hero—Moderato. Suggest "Legend"—Friml; "Romance"—Mericante, or "Serenade"—Llandon.

Another "Western" atmosphere effusion. Treat it with breezy stuff. Many "hurrys" are needed, a few galops and one or two misteriosos. A few dramatic selections will fit the last two reels. Cue sheet can be obtained from the Fox exchange.

SOUL IN TRUST, A (Triangle—Five Reels)—Theme—Adagio. Suggest "The Stars Are Calling"—Stern; "The Swan"—Saint Saens, or "Inspiration"—Edward.

Note the storm in the first reel and use "The Tempest," by Grieg, if possible. The music must be heavy throughout the entire picture. Many dramatics, pathetics and a few agitados are needed. Cue sheet can be obtained from the Triangle exchange.

WEAVER OF DREAMS, THE (Metro-Roife—Five Reels)—Theme for Heroine—Valse Lento. Suggest "Just a Little Love"—Sllesu; "Waters of Venice"—Von Tilzer; "Doucement"—Roberts, or "Destiny Waltz"—Bayne.

The story has a pathetic side to it and will need some semi-heart-throb stuff to accompany it. Where Dana tells her uncle of her dreams use fantastic music, such as "Dance Fantastic" or "March of the Dwarf"—Grieg. A couple of dramatic pieces only are needed. Cue sheet can be obtained from the Metro exchange.

WILD WOMEN (Universal—Five Reels)—No theme necessary.

The picture opens with Western stuff, then you will need Hawaiian music for the cabaret. Some misteriosos and "hurrys" follow, with a big moment when the ship's crew mutiny and the ship takes fire. Later we have South Sea Isle atmosphere, and Oriental or Hawaiian music is needed. Cue sheet can be obtained from the Universal exchange.

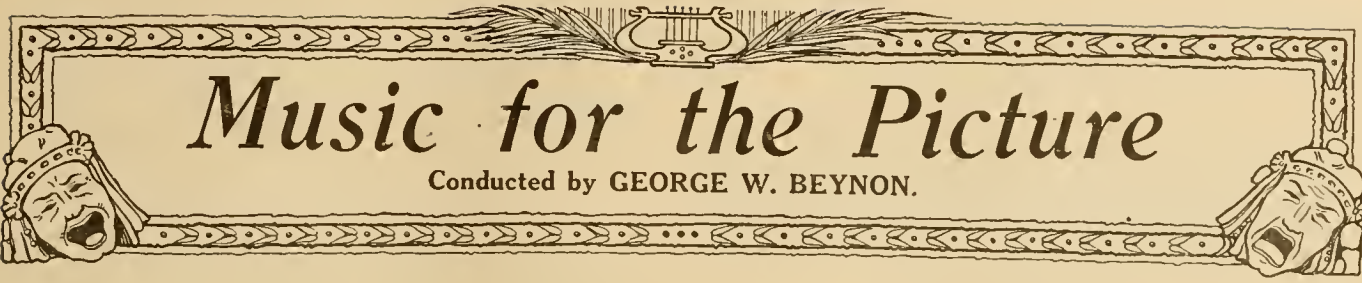

WOING OF PRINCESS PAT, THE (Blue Ribbon—Five Reels)—Theme for Heroine—Allegretto. Suggest "Garden of Love"—Ascher; "A Little Story"—Lack, or "Nodding Tulip"—Trinkaus.

The music needed will be light stuff—waltz intermezzos, melodious serenades, caprices and polkas. Note the court scene in the fourth reel and select a processional march for it, such as "Swedish Coronation"—Svendson, or "Hall America"—Drumm. The last reel calls for a little melodramatic music. Cue sheet can be obtained from the Vitagraph exchange.

Questions Answered—Suggestions Offered.

Q. In playing "blues" how do you get the real "nigger" effects?
A. There is no way to explain the peculiar darky rhythm acquired by Southern players that make "blues" effective. It is a thing born in the player and not made. Would advise that you hear the real thing

The Musical Library at the New York Strand.

"'Twas a dark and stormy night" when we called informally upon the general conductor of the Strand Symphony Orchestra and asked him to tell us something new. Carl Edouarde, the gentleman in question, has a little Irish strain somewhere within him and he will not take a dare. Piloting us up two flights of winding stair he ushered us, grandiloquently, into his "sacrotum sanctorum," where a librarian sorts, files and cares for the large library used in the setting of pictures.

On four sides lined against the wall and reaching almost to the ceiling are galvanized iron lockers, painted green (another evidence of strong Irish tastes). These were not filled with clothes, as one might expect, but contained music. Within each locker, from top to bottom, are shelves set in to leave a space of about two feet. These compartments hold a specific kind of music, the classification being labelled on the inside of the door directly facing them. Each locker is numbered on the outside, and the classification begins alphabetically with Locker No. 1. For example, commencing at the top compartment of No. 1, we noted "Agitatos," then "Anthems," "Battle Scenes" and "Berceuses," and so on through the entire shelving. In the last few were found "Songs," "Symphonies" and "Suites." These lockers are fire and dust-proof, easy of access, conserve space, and the finest thing of the kind we have seen. It was a big expense to install this system, but the saving of time, labor, wear and tear of the music has made it all worth-while.

"I do not use the tempo classification," said Mr. Edouarde, "because it is misleading. Besides," he continued, "many numbers have changes of tempo in them and frequently we can get better effects from an Andante found in a Suite than by the use of a piece that is Andante in itself.

"After I have seen the picture to be presented, noted the cues, and made a memorandum of the possibilities in the way of music, my librarian takes the data and brings me the music requested. Many of the numbers cannot be used for various reasons. Each is stamped with the date last played, and we make it a practice never to repeat more than once within three months. And I can assure you Manager Edel is just as strong for this ruling as I am. We adhere to it strictly.

"After the music is selected, my librarian puts it in its proper rotation, cue sheets are typed and placed on each music stand with the setting. This is only a small part of the presentation of the picture. The little artistic touches, lighting effects, dramatic effects, and surprises, are worked out in conference with Mr. Edel, our electrician, and sometimes our concert master."

We asked Mr. Edouarde his opinion regarding the use of more than one theme in a setting. We have continually maintained in this column that it is neither practical nor feasible with a small orchestra, but it is possible with a large combination; yet with an orchestra of fifty men Mr. Edouarde says, "I believe one theme is enough for any picture with but few exceptions. Once in a while a feature requires two for the purpose of contrast, but never more. Even in 'Stella Maris' we used only one, and ignored the dual character, leaving it to the intelligence of the audience to distinguish between the two roles. People do not want the music to make the picture too obvious but like a little mental exercise with their enjoyment of it.

"For that reason I believe in portraying the emotion of a scene and allowing the atmospheric effects, such as rain, waves, storm and wind, to be done 'Back scenes.' In 'The Beloved Traitor' we had a deathbed scene of deepest sorrow, while outside raged a storm of rain and wind. The usual method of fitting this situation would be the use of a 'tempest' number or a 'hurry.' We used the 'Lamento,' by Gabriel Marie, for the orchestra, and off-stage the wind machines worked overtime. It was a long scene and had we played a 'hurry' it would have become monotonous in the extreme.

"In this connection I might say that I do not believe in fitting each little flash. We try to get the general feeling of the picture and work up to its climax, using long numbers if possible. If the prevailing emotion of a scene remains on the screen for an unusually long period I take that opportunity of resting my orchestra and allow the organ to fit it. This gives change of musical color to the setting and is only one of the many means by which I obtain variety of tonal effects.

"No picture is properly presented unless it has variety of coloring. If the setting comprises selections that are of the same order, orchestrated much in the same manner and similarly melodious, it becomes tedious to the audience. No artist ever painted a masterpiece in one color, and no great symphony has been written for strings alone. I try to introduce numbers containing oboe, flute, French horn, or cello solos. To get change of color we use a harp and frequently put in a selection of chamber music, if a special color be desired.

"It requires strong mental poise to refrain from using the brass too much. Every conductor loves the fl. passages and his inclination leans strongly that way continually, yet the art lies in reserving the brass section of the orchestra for coloring. Frequently we purposely keep it silent even when a part is written for them. The composer might not like it, but then he did not fit the picture, nor did he write for pictures. Thus we are forced to edit his works to get the best results in the coloring of our musical settings."

Carl Edouarde is one of the few pioneer moving picture conductors and still keenly enthusiastic over his work. His years of band and orchestral experience proved of untold value when he entered this new field. He is conscientious in his efforts and continually strives to better his performances. He has been a big help to many young musicians and always stands ready to assist them with his sound advice and good counsel.

Music at the Rivoli.

During the week commencing March 10 the Rivoli presented almost an entire Spanish performance. The Rothapfel idea of keeping everything in the-atmosphere of the feature is a good one, and should be emulated by every exhibitor desiring increased box office receipts. "Roxy's" foot slipped a bit when he introduced a Japanese dancer, who, though very artistic in her number, completely upset the Spanish ensemble effect.

The overture, "Espana," by Chabrier, was well played by the orchestra, and carried all the necessary "pep" to get it over. Emo Rapee was not altogether happy in his conducting thereof, but the number succeeded in spite of him.

Following the overture a scenic called "Glimpses of Hawaii" received a magnificent musical setting, and was further enhanced by the appropriate selection "Aloha Oe," rendered by Helen Morrill and the Rivoli Chorus. They were programed as two numbers, but dove-tailed so well that we felt that they belonged to each other. The singing was remarkably good, the costumes true to type, and the lighting effects a la Rothapfel—superb.

The music for the pictorial was a procession of marches, which to the layman in the audience meant a choppy presentation. If it required so many we failed to see it, and feel sure that it had a nervous effect upon the patrons. However, what was played was well played, which is praise in these days when orchestras turn a march into a one-step.

Miguel Vidal sang "Lolita," by Buzzi-Peccia. The best part of this number was the fact that the song and the singer were both Spanish, in keeping with the general tone of the performance. Our old friend Doug. Fairbanks followed in "Headin' South," and the music selected could not be bettered. Fairbanks' pictures are hard to fit adequately, but the Rivoli never seems to find obstacles that are insurmountable. One thing that pleased us immensely was the lack of organ in the feature. The orchestra played it through without the usual rest period. The organ has no place in a comedy, and but few exhibitors realize how their audience feels on this subject. Mr. Rothapfel is more than "abreast of the times" in these matters; he leads the times.

The Japanese Dance, before mentioned, came seventh on the program, followed by a Drew comedy, and the usual excellent organ solo closed the bill. All that was needed to make this show absolutely wonderful was a Spanish dancer in number seven spot. It is remarkable what a hit can be made by living up to one idea throughout the entire performance and making everything conform thereto. Speaking to exhibitors, we suggest that you try it. It is worth publicity in quantities, and should bring good business.

"Moral Suicide" Music.

Last Tuesday at the New York Roof Ivan Abramson presented, for the trade showing, his masterly depiction of life's problem, "Moral Suicide." George Beynon is found guilty of perpetrating the music, which was admirably handled by the Loew orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Lutz.

This score is unique in its varied themes, and made a decided hit with the large audience. Leah Baird, acting the "vamp" role, drew "My Heart At Thy Sweet Voice" from the opera "Samson et Delilah," while Ann Luther, was given that beautiful Waltz from "Lucia Di Lammermoor." John Mason found expression in the Ballet Music from "La Traviata" and the son was given that characteristic number "Le Coucou" by Arensky. "Don Jose's Aria" from "Carmen" fitted the hero to perfection, especially during his love scenes. All these themes are woven together in such a manner that if the eye should stray from the picture the ear would tell who was performing thereon.

The balance of the score is made up from such dramatic operas as "Fedora," "Queen of Sheba," "Tristan and Isolde," "Mephistofele," and gems from the old masters—namely, "Reproche"—Karganoff; "La Coquette"—Onivas; "Nocturne"—Chopin; "Canzonetta"—Heimendahl; Norwegian Folk Song—Borch; Excerpts from Ermline, and a couple of two-steps.

The picture does not depend upon battle scenes or patriotism to "get over," but deals in the big problems of life as one sees them all about him. A slovenly setting would ruin the presentation of it, and it is strongly advisable that the exhibitor booking this feature should procure the score that fits every foot of film.

Music for "My Four Years in Germany."

Last week there crept into another column of our paper an error, which we are pleased to correct. It was stated that the music, specially written for the picture now playing at the Knickerbocker theater—"My Four Years in Germany"—was arranged by Hugo Reisenfeld. The facts in the matter are different. Meyer Brothers took entire charge of the musical setting, and have given the picture a well arranged score, which materially adds to the feature.

Musical Suggestion Synopsis.

BEGGAR WOMAN, THE (Russian Art—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Andante and Russian. Suggest "Song of the Boatmen of the Volga"—Cady, or "Visions"—Tschaiowsky.

Pathetic stuff is needed most for this picture. The atmosphere is entirely Russian, and the following list may benefit small libraries, which are weak in Russian music: "Gondoliera"—Moszkowski; "Reve Angeliqne"—Rubinstein; "Russian Romance"—Friml. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Pathe Exchange.

EVE'S DAUGHTER (Paramount—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Allegretto. Suggest "In the Shadows"—Finck; "Nodding Tulip"—Trinkhaus, or "Serenade"—Frommel.

Light music will fit the picture, a few semi-pathetics, a couple of agitados and many waltz intermezzos. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paramount Exchange.

FAITH ENDURIN' (Triangle—5 Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Allegretto. Suggest "Canzonetta"—Godard; "Serenade"—Drda, or "Songs Without Words"—Tschaiowsky.

This picture is peculiar in its opening. You will need misterioso stuff and dramatic agitados. The atmosphere becomes rustic and needs music like "Barchetta"—Nevin; "In Lovers' Lane"—Pryor, or "Violetta"—Tobani. Note the fire scene in the third reel. Cue sheets can be obtained from Triangle Exchange.

GIRL IN THE DARK, THE (Bluebird—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Moderato. Suggest "Intermezzo"—Hueter; "Serenade"—Karganoff, or "Melodie in F"—Rubinstein.

The story contains many dramatic situations. Melodramatic music is needed, such as agitados, hurrys and misteriosos. There is considerable Chinese music needed to fit the "Tong Society" attempts to abduct the heroine. Suggest "Hop-Sing"—Katzenstein, or "Chinese Wedding Procession"—Hosmer. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Universal Exchange.

GIRL AND THE JUDGE, THE (Mutual—5 Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Andante. Suggest "Dreams of Love"—Liszt; "Souvenir"—German, or "Romance"—Le Cocq.

The picture opens brightly, with a reception scene and a Hallowe'en party in the first reel. The latter requires a Virginia Reel and a popular two-step. Much dramatic stuff is needed and a few pathetics. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Mutual Exchange.

HARD ROCK BREED, THE (Triangle—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Andante. Suggest "On Wings of Song"—Meudelsohn; "Serenade"—Cesek, or "Herd Girl's Dream"—Labitsky.

Western atmosphere. Melodious music will fit the first two reels. Note explosion effect in third and big fights in the fourth and fifth reels. A lot of dramatic agitados are also necessary. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Triangle Exchange.

HOUSE OF GLASS, THE (Select—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Valse Lento. Suggest "Heartstrings"—Vecsey; "Chanson Triste"—Tschaiowsky, or "Destiny"—Bayones.

This is a melodrama requiring many misteriosos, agitados and dramatic pieces. Note the change from eastern to western atmosphere and symbolize it in your music. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Select Exchange.

MORAL SUICIDE (Graphic—Seven Reels)—Theme for John Mason-Ballet Music—Moderato. Suggest "La Traviata Ballet," "Faust Ballet, Part 1, or "Canzonetta"—Nicode.

The picture is dramatic depiction of life. Many dramatic numbers, a couple of waltzes and two hurrys are needed; otherwise light music fits the first three reels. No cue sheets available, but a score can be obtained from the Graphic Film Company.

NOBODY'S WIFE (Universal—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Moderato. Suggest "Cavatina"—Bohm; "At Sunset"—Brewer, or "Dainty Daffodils"—Miles.

Tula picture needs mountain music. Suggest the "Mountain Suite"—Borch; "Peer Gynt Suite"—Grieg, and some of Nevin's pastorales. Light music will fit throughout. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Universal Exchange.

SIGN INVISIBLE, THE (National Exhibitors—Five Reels)—Theme for Lone Deer—Indian Music. Suggest "Dagger Dance" from "Natuna"—Herbert; "Indian Love Song"—Lake, or "Scalp Dance"—Lake.

You will need pastorale music a-plenty for this picture, and Canadian, if possible, such as "On the Banks of the Saskatchewan." There is little dramatic music needed, many pathetics and a couple of hurrys. Cue sheets not available.

TRIUMPH OF VENUS, THE (Victor—Six Reels)—No theme necessary. The music for this must be light, fantastic stuff, pastorale in the extreme, as it deals with the mythological gods and goddesses. Nothing dramatic is required, and it is strongly advisable to refrain from a too frequent use of waltzes. Scores can be obtained from the Victor Film Manufacturing Company.

WATCH YOUR NEIGHBOR (Paramount-Sennett—2 Reels)—Theme—none.

This is a comedy of slap-stick variety. Lots of rough and tumble scenes. Use the usual one-steps, two-steps, fox trots and light stuff. No cue sheets available.

WHIMS OF SOCIETY (World—5 Reels)—Theme for the heroine—Andantino.

Suggest "Remembrance," Telma; "Melodie," Lederer, or "Astarte," Mildenberg.

Most light stuff will suit this picture, with a couple of dramatic tensions and a few waltzes. Cue sheets can be obtained from the World Exchange.

Leaders' Service Bureau.

Questions Answered—Suggestions Offered.

Q. Is it true that the mother of Richard Strauss, the composer, was a daughter of a brewer?

A. Musical History by Gunn is the authority for this statement. "The mother of Richard Strauss was born and brought up in Munich and was the daughter of a well known brewer."

Q. There is a French horn player in our town who wants to play in my orchestra. I only use piano, violin, cello and drums. Would a French horn fit in this combination?

A. A French horn would be decidedly out of place in such a small combination. One French horn is never effective under any circumstances, because two or more are needed to give the required filling.

Q. Is the "Lest We Forget" score available?

A. There is, and a good one. Write Mr. W. E. Atkinson, the business manager of the Metro, and he will attend to your wants.

Q. I heard a crackerjack march, "Pershing's March," played in New York recently, but am unable to find out where it is published. Can you help me?

A. We are informed that this good march will be out and ready for sale about the 15th instant. It will be published by The Astoria Pub. Co., 505 Fifth Avenue, New York.

Q. Does the Fox company put out cue sheets with the time noted thereon, and suggestions for themes and movements?

A. Fox Film Co. issue cue sheets on all their releases which can be procured from their exchanges. They do not give the time duration of each number nor specific suggestions, the tempo being given instead. We are sure that they would put you on their mailing list if you wrote them direct.

Q. I find the cue sheets supplied by often repeat numbers, and my house manager has been complaining to me about playing certain pieces too frequently. He says his patrons tell him that I play the same old things over and over. Is there not some way to get action from the producing company furnishing these cue sheets? I have written their music editor several times, but he pays no attention to my letters.

A. Instead of writing the musical editor we would advise writing your exchange manager. He will get action where you have failed. See our article, "GET THE BEST IN CUE SHEETS."

Q. Why is it that so few of the big scores coming to my theater are arranged without any regard to synchrony whatever? Surely the arrangers preparing these scores must know that unless the music has been properly timed with the picture somebody is going to get balled up. I won't mention names, but there is not one arranger in ten who gives the slightest attention to synchronizing his score.

A. Have patience, brother; this child is just beginning to grow and little perfection can be expected yet. However, there are many scores that are synchronized in the beginning, but fail to come out right, because the film has been cut. This grievance should only obtain in a few scenes if the score has been properly put together in the first place.

Q. Where can I get an album containing all the latest New York fox-trots and one-steps?

A. We know of no such album procurable. Fox-trots and one-steps have short lives and no publisher desires to go to additional expense that has no outlook for future returns. Every music house will take your address and be pleased to send you each new edition as it comes off the press, charging you as you get it from time to time.

Atmosphere in Music and Performance.

WHEN music is characteristic of a specific clime, type of people, custom or peculiar condition it is called atmospheric. We have the characteristic music of Japan, China, Russia, Scotland, Ireland, Germany, France, Scandinavia, Italy, Spain and the Orient. We also have tribal music which is distinctly atmospheric—American Indian music, negro melodies, chanty songs of the French-Canadian, Hawaiian music, and many numbers characteristic of South America.

There are usually three forms of music peculiar to each nationality—viz., Song, Dance and Classic numbers. The dance form is probably more profuse and also more aboriginal in its treatment, because the other forms are colored somewhat from outside musical influence. It is only natural that a composer should subconsciously use the style, form or bits of melody from the masters whom he has studied. This detracts from the distinctiveness of the composition, and for the same reason causes the atmosphere to deteriorate in the same ratio.

The national air is not always atmospheric, though by constant use is closely associated with the country which it represents. The Portuguese hymn has nothing peculiar to the country itself, and is used throughout the world under different names. The English national anthem has been traced to Prussian origin, and is sung by us to different words. The "Marseillaise," though born in France, has become widely known and sung by the Socialists, Anarchist and Nihilist in every land. Thus it has lost its atmosphere in a measure.

On the other hand, the national hymn of Russia could never signify anything not Russian, and though certain composers are bringing forth a new one it, too, will be atmospheric beyond question. Japan, America, Spain, Greece, Sweden have typically atmospheric music for their national airs. Italy has made no definite selection for symbolic purposes, but Garibaldi's Hymn brings the people to their feet and receives recognition and respect.

You cannot rely on a number by reference to its name. Neither can you feel sure of its character by noting the composer. Names mean nothing as far as musical analysis is concerned, for Tschaiakowsky wrote "Capriccio Italien" in imitation of Verdi. He also wrote some wonderful Oriental music; while his songs partake of the flavor of many countries. Yet his Russian depictions have never been equalled in the portrayal of the down-trodden peasant. Among the many composers who have consistently written in the atmosphere of their own country we have Verdi, Wagner, Dvorak, Grieg, Debussy, Ippolita Ivanow and Valverde of today.

We also have those composers who make a study of foreign types and conditions and write more or less successfully characteristic numbers. Arthur Farwell has demonstrated his ability in arranging the Indian melodies of America, while many have essayed Oriental music with a considerable success.

Peculiar conditions bring forth music that is typical of the people living under them. We have East Side music, the Apache dance, characteristic Christmas carols, patriotic numbers dealing with historical events, college songs, circus music, and many others. These may vary greatly in form and melody, but breathe the atmosphere of the peculiar conditions under which they find origin.

Then again we have music which is characteristic of periods of time. The Civil War brought forth some new songs, such as "Dixie" and "Seeing Nellie Home." The French Revolution gave birth to many folk songs, which even yet are remembered and sung by the bourgeois.

Coming down to the practical side of this question we find that there is a volume of atmospheric music to be obtained. This fact should not be overlooked by the orchestra leaders in picture theaters, and a special classification should be made of characteristic music. Many pictures come to a house where the musical director is endowed with but a small library, and 75 per cent. of the picture receives an American setting when it deserves all Russian or all Spanish. The leader should do some research work and not depend on the standard numbers that are well known. Songs make excellent themes, and dance music played according to the action of the picture is intensely atmospheric.

In setting (for example) a Russian picture care should be taken to gain variety. Don't place several Andante numbers in rotation. It is better to repeat one if necessary and follow with an allegretto or waltz movement. If the locations, conditions and types are all Russian throughout see to it that the setting be all Russian. The public is awake and expect it.

Going further and speaking to the exhibitor.

Taking it for granted that the feature has been well set with all Russian music, why not make the entire performance permeate Russian atmosphere? Have the singers sing, in costume, Russian songs; choose a typical Russian overture, such as "Prelude," by Rachmaninoff; book your topical review and scenic with this idea before you, and note the remarkable drawing power of such a show. This is not a new idea, but one which is being worked in one of the foremost theaters in the country. Recently the writer was struck most forcibly by the way this plan was "put across." It gives continuity, good publicity and a freedom from that "variety-hall-lighting-change" idea. The following sample program may be suggestive:

1. OVERTURE—PreludeRachmaninoff
Theater Orchestra.
2. PICTORIAL REVIEW:
Showing Russian Soldiers Entraining, Cossacks Riding, Kerensky Addressing People, Russian Fleet Manouvering, etc.
3. SONG—"Longing"Rubenstein
Sung by Miss Jane Jones.
4. SCENIC—The Caucasus Mountains.
5. BARITONE SOLO—"Wanderer's Song".....Tschaiakowsky
Sung by Bertram Brown.
6. FEATURE—"The Fall of the Romanoffs."
7. ENTR'ACTE—"Kol Nedrei"Bruch
8. COMEDY.

It is hardly possible to choose a comedy that will fit the situation, but that is somewhat negligible because its function is to send the patrons away happy.

To carry the idea to its fulfillment the ushers could be costumed as Russian peasants, soldiers or Cossacks, as deemed wise. The lobby display should bear out the general idea, while a Cossack upon a white horse, for street parade purposes, would gain considerable attention.

In this age of specialists we must devote our entire efforts in one direction. Atmospheric performances are different, attractive and fascinating. With proper publicity they are sure to increase the reputation of the theater and its box office receipts.

Music at the Broadway.

We visited the Broadway, where they are running "The Kaiser—The Beast of Berlin," with no anticipations of enjoyment, and, as usual, received a pleasant surprise. Blessed are they who expect little for they shall receive much.

We found our old friend, James Bradford, in charge of the music, with his former associates gathered about him in the orchestra pit. The return of the Broadway orchestra to its first love creates for that theater a decidedly different atmosphere and again places it in the foreground musically. Mr. Bradford's wide experience and pleasing personality makes for good music at all times.

The performance opened with the playing of the Star Spangled Banner, immediately followed by the overture, "Il Guarany, by Gomez. There was conveyed a feeling of unpreparedness in this number, and the cut of eight bars preceding the first lento movement changed somewhat the character of the selection. However, it was well received by the immense audience and withal was a creditable performance.

Then came an educational film interpreted orchestrally by the use of a medley of light popular airs, known as "Shoo-fly" stuff, but not played that way. The idea of fitting in this manner an educational dealing in varied subjects is decidedly pleasing. The only criticism we have to offer would be to suggest changing the music at the change of the subject. From the care of a furnace to mounted constabulary is a decided change and should be so indicated in the music.

The feature is one of the strongest we have seen, admirably adaptable to music, and its continuity lends itself to long selections, which means a smooth performance. There was no attempt at absolute synchrony, yet, in view of the length of the scenes, one did not notice the changes of tempo.

It is one of the best musical settings we have heard in many a day. The music was good. The theme for the Kaiser—"Processional March," by Schwarwenka, was most appropriate. Such fine things as Valkyrie music by Wagner, "Implication of Neptune," from the Phedre Ballet, by Massenet; "Symphonic Poem," from Francesca di Rimini, by Tschaiakowsky, and as a finale, the "Bacchus Processional," by Delibes, were most effective and fitting. We felt that the Ride of the Valkyrie was played a bit too slow for dramatic effect, but the music throughout was most impressive and carried the situations splendidly.

The touch of atmospheric effect as the picture closed was good. A soldier and sailor appear at each side of the stage, trumpet in hand, and join in the playing of "My Country, 'Tis of Thee," finishing precisely with the picture. We heard many comment favorably upon this little artistic touch. It is a fitting finish to a fine feature.

Mr. Al Nathan, former manager of the Superba theater at Los Angeles, California, and the Alhambra, in San Francisco, is now presiding over the destiny of the Broadway. He is strong for good music and has a keen insight regarding the needs of the public. "Jimmie" and he should make a team that will be heard from.

Musical Suggestion Synopsis.

ACCIDENTAL HONEYMOON, AN (Rafp Productions—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Valse Lento. Suggest "The Way of Love"—Cremieux, "Dodola"—Frey, or "Doucement"—Roberts.

This is a good comedy where the following numbers can be used to advantage. "Forgotten"—Cowles, "Last Night was the End of the World"—Von Tilzer, "On the 5.15," "Love, Here is My Heart"—Silesu, and "Sweethearts"—Herbert. The entire setting should be light and there is needed a few pastorale and rustic pieces. Cue sheets can be obtained from Ivan Film Exchange.

ALIEN ENEMY (Paralta Plays—Six Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Andante. Suggest "Intermezzo"—Bizet, "Tendre Aveu"—Schutt, or "Twilight"—Ayer.

Dramatic music will play the predominant part in this good war-time picture. At T.—"Officers of The Golden Butterfly"—The Prussian National Anthem is needed while the Stars and Stripes by Sousa can be used at T—"Beneath Autumn Opal Skies." There is a direct cue—T.—"We've Come to Can the Kaiser," and the music required is the Battle Hymn of the Republic, once through. During the picture the American flag appears frequently, and we suggest that your cornet (muted) sound out the first measure and a half of the Star Spangled Banner. If the instrument is missing have the pianist attend to it at every appearance of the flag. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paralta Exchange.

AMERICAN BUDS (Fox—Six Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Moderato. Suggest "Basket of Roses"—Albers, "Dainty Daffodils"—Miles, or "In Poppyland"—Albers.

The music should be light in the main, but there is a patriotic feeling throughout the picture requiring a bit of marshal stuff. Catch the bugle call at cue T.—"The Morning Call," and the march in the fifth reel. For the latter we would suggest "Pershing's March," by Watt. At cue D.—"Kids Playing Guitars," have some Hawaiian selection ready. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Fox Exchange.

BLINFOLDED (Paralta Plays—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Andante. Suggest "Elysium"—Speaks, "Awakening of Spring"—Bach, or "Love's Longing"—Frontini.

This picture deals with the denizens of the underworld, opening with semi-misterioso stuff and continuing dramatically to T.—"After the Release." During the robbery scene we would suggest the use of the first movement of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony. In the third and fourth reels pastorale numbers and bright pieces will fit admirably. During the fifth reel have "La Forza del Destino" by Verdi ready, as it is dramatic throughout, closing with the theme. Note pistol shot effect after T.—"Midnight Finds Peggy, etc." Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paralta Exchange.

BLUE BIRD, THE (Paramount—Six Reels)—No theme necessary. This feature is the picturization of Maeterlinck's masterpiece and, owing to its allegorical nature, requires a peculiar setting. Everything must be fantastic, such as "Les Syphides"—Cussans, "Dance of Fire and Water"—O'Neill, "Petite Suite"—Debussy, "Entr'Acte"—Hadley, "March of Life and Death"—Humperdinck, and "Ara-besque No. 1"—Debussy. Get the cue sheet, if possible, because there is little possibility of fitting the picture without it. Cue sheet can be obtained from the Paramount Exchange.

DEBT OF HONOR, THE (Fox—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Andante. Suggest "Serenade"—Titt'l, or "To a Star"—Leonard.

The picture has two atmospheres, the earlier one being a fairy story, and the latter a war-time patriotic episode. It would be wise to select oriental music for the first portion in order that there may be a distinct comparison with the later stuff. You will need a few misteriosos and one agitato. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Fox Exchange.

DEVIL'S WHEEL, THE (Fox—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Plaintive Andante. Suggest "Narcissus"—Nevin, "Reverie"—Corelli, or "Eventide"—Shytte.

The location is in France and the music should hold French atmosphere. Choose from such composers as Massenet, Bizet, Berlioz, Faur, or Chaminade. Many misteriosos and agitados are required and the picture opens dramatically. Note the Apache dance in the second reel, which must be repeated later in the same reel and again in the last reel. Catch the big fight in the fifth reel and close with the theme. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Fox Exchange.

KAISER, THE (Jewel Film Co.—Seven Reels). See MUSIC AT THE BROADWAY elsewhere in this department.

MATINEE GIRL, THE (Perfection Pictures—One reel). This is a comedy requiring light music, but not of the slap-stick variety. Use comic opera selections and a bit of a love theme might be used with effect. No cue sheets are available.

SHELL GAME, THE (Metro—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Andantino. Suggest "Rosemary"—Elgar, "Moonbeams"—Keiser, (Norwegian Folk Song)—Borch.

You will need light music for this comedy-drama. Catch the popular one-step at T.—"Then followed a week of gayety"—and the hurry following immediately afterwards. You will need "Home, Sweet Home," and "Ben Bolt" almost immediately after the opening of the picture and a few bars of "Rigoletto Opera" selection at cue T.—"A Caruso Night." Cue sheets can be obtained from the Metro Exchange.

SPLendid SINNER, THE (Goldwyn—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Andante. Suggest "Love Theme"—Lee, "Claire de Lune"—Thome, or "Dream of the Flowers"—Cohen.

Dramatic music is mostly required for this setting. Catch all the violin solos and use "The Song of the Soul," by Breil, if possible. At cut T.—"Britishers Enlist Today"—you can use "Over There" played pp. with fine effect. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Goldwyn Exchange.

WANTED, A MOTHER (World—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Valse Lento. Suggest "Destiny Waltz"—Baynes, "Heartstrings"—Vecsey, or "Innamorata"—Marchetti.

This is a juvenile picture and calls for a predominancy of light music. Some Italian slum music is needed and a couple of pathetics. Cue sheets can be obtained from the World Film Exchange.

WHISPERING CHORUS, THE (Paramount—Six Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Andantino. Suggest "Russian Romance"—Friml, "Summer Nights"—Roberts, "Visions"—Tschalkowsky.

Big staff is required for this picture. There is a religious phase that calls for hymns such as "Nearer My God to Thee," "Where is My Wandering Boy Tonight?" (cello solo, if possible), "Home, Sweet Home," and "In the Gloaming" as a finish. You will need also a Chinese selection and the Wedding March. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paramount Exchange.

WOMAN AND THE LAW (Fox—Seven Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Dramatic Andante. Suggest "Last Dream of a Virgin"—Massenet, "La Melancholic"—Prume, or "Meditation"—Delmas.

This is a dramatic picturization of a famous murder trial and must be fitted accordingly. Possibly a Spanish theme could fit better than those suggested, but it must be dramatic. Open the picture with Spanish atmosphere and continue light until the fourth reel. The music from this point is dramatic and pathetic with a heavy agitato in the fifth reel. Close with the theme. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Fox Exchange.

Q. "What distinguishes an orchestral organ from a pipe organ? Have either a place as a component part of an orchestra?"

A. "The orchestral organ is one of recent invention, manufactured specially for the handling of pictures. It has all of the traps attachments and has the same effect as piano and drums together. The quality is by no means so fine as that of the pipe organ. Both have a place in orchestral work."

Q. "Is piano ever used in a symphony orchestra?"

A. "Yes. A piano is frequently used in a symphony orchestra, especially in such things as Liszt's Second Rhapsody. It is also used in the absence of harp for the arpeggios and cadenzas."

Organ vs. Orchestra.

THERE seems to be a wide divergency of opinion regarding the greater merits between the organ and orchestra as an agency for the proper presentation of pictures. Many exhibitors maintain that they obtain better results from the organ, while there are just as many who will not have one in their theater. We will try to crystalize the different opinions and, from our wide experience in such matters, essay to point the way to clarity of vision.

A good organ—and by that we mean a real organ and not a hurdy-gurdy which has every clap-trap contrivance born of an inventive brainstorm—is a glorious instrument, holding large possibilities for wonderful effects. It has many of the orchestral qualities of tone, as shown by the use of the oboe, flauto and corni stops. The bassoon is heard in the deep diapason, and the muted strings are correctly imitated by the vox humana. Patrons say that it's "grand music" and feel the grandeur of it. It is "grand music" and continues to be "grand music."

The organ cannot be anything else but grand, and its very grandeur becomes monotony under the touch of the average organist. When the show opens with an overture played by the organ, the scenic played by the organ, the pictorial review played by the organ, the feature played by the organ, the comedy played by the organ, and an exit march played by the organ, the patrons certainly get too much organ. Moreover, a good organist will not play continually, or if he does, he must perform, slump somewhat in his good work. The organ may stand it, but he, being fleshly, is prone to weakness, so why place an artist in a test of endurance and expect good results?

Orchestras cannot and will not play continuously. No one expects them to do it. No one wants them to do it. They, too, would become monotonous, though the chances are considerably small because of the wide possibilities of change in color and tempo.

There are a few musicians—but they are far between—that are geniuses on the manuals. Their cleverness in registration does away with monotony, and the organ is made to speak in any language required by the picture. The organist that can lend variety to his playing is a rare bird, temperamental in the extreme and difficult to control. By virtue of his ability he commands respect and knows his full value. If he be progressive another gem is added to his crown and he will give service that cannot be estimated in dollars and cents, but should his virtuosity make him self satisfied he becomes a drag on the wheels of progress. No theater can afford to hold a musician that will not heed new ideas and learn therefrom. The benefits derived from an organ depend entirely upon the player. He must be technically good besides being endowed with remarkable intelligence in the fitting of pictures. Some organists gain this knowledge by experience, others never get it. They play well, that's all.

We have always maintained in these columns that an organ has no place in a comedy and cannot properly fit the funny situations. An organ is always a sombre instrument, dignified and sedate, and no one expects it to get "giddy." Fantastic stuff can be played, but not funny music. The truth of this is borne out by the fact that some manufacturers have designed special organs to fill the need of slap-stick music. No theater has the room for, nor can they afford the expense of, two organs, yet neither can do the work of the other. The salesman will argue that the "hurdy-gurdy" can be used in the same manner and for the same purpose as a church organ. The difference in price is thousands of dollars, and the facts prove that the quality is by no means the same. Because of the additional clap-trap stops the instrument becomes easily and frequently out of tune and requires constant repairing. The expensive organ is the cheaper in the long run and gives the best musicianly results. But—don't use it in the comedy.

Since an organ has no place in a comedy, and because no patron desires to look at a funny picture in silence, it is vitally necessary to fit it with music of some kind. A piano is effective in playing for the comedy if an orchestra is financially beyond the resources of the theater. A good pianist can get many wonderful effects by closely following the picture. Glissandos, train effects, falls, shots and chimes are perfectly easy to perform, while many other more difficult imitations are made more ludicrous by their piano depiction, for example, the crowing of a rooster.

Another serious drawback to the use of the organ is the dearth of music written for the instrument and suitable for pictures. Organ compositions are in the big minority and those written are so seldom suitable for picture work that the average organist depends largely upon his improvisations to fill the need of a library. There is nothing so meaningless to the musical ear as improvisations poorly done. It is an art in itself and requires many years of untiring practice, which brings us back to the already established fact—the player must be an artist.

Some organists use an orchestra piano copy and play from it the chief melodies or cued parts. Now one thing must be clearly understood; music is written for a specific purpose, with a particular arrangement thereof, and if played by an instrument for which it was never intended does not convey the meaning of the number. Notes in themselves, melodies separated from the accompaniment, mean nothing. By looking at a brick we cannot visualize the house, and it is only when a number is played as written, by the instruments for which it was arranged, that we can divine the true thought of the composer. Therefore, we should eliminate orchestral music from the library of the organist who is an artist. He will not play it, and his refusal is most praiseworthy.

There is little room for publicity in the use of an organ, and no room for showmanship. The player becomes part of the mechanical instrument, and he may be black, white or yellow, so far as the audience is concerned. If he delivers the goods he gets his measure of praise and perhaps a smattering of applause. Patrons like to see the performing artist and watch how he does it. The manner of the doing frequently gains as much appreciation as the worthy performance. Good showmanship is a big asset to any theater, and in this respect the orchestra has a chance to command attention, where the organist is "born to blush unseen."

A concise resumé brings us the following facts:

- (1) Organs can be used effectively if played by organists of superior ability and conspicuous individuality.
- (2) Organs become monotonous.
- (3) Organs cannot be used for comedies.
- (4) Organs give no chance for showmanship.
- (5) Organists cannot procure sufficient music for the adequate playing of pictures without the prostitution of their art.
- (6) Improvisation is to be feared lest it become chronic, which means a lower standard of music.
- (7) Scarcity of good capable organists.

We are in no way attempting to decry the use of the organ in the motion picture theaters nor do we discredit this noble instrument of sound. It has its place and properly used becomes a mighty auxiliary force in portraying the pictures.

It is hardly necessary to read our brief for the defendant—Mr. Orchestra. His capabilities are well known. He has demonstrated his worth and continues to be a box-office asset.

Orchestras must have proper directors and be composed of good musicians. There is no scarcity of either. A poor orchestra is as much worse than a poor organist as a good combination is better. Quoting from a trade paper a well-known film expert says:

"Can" the overhead of bum orchestras, organs are more effective as musical accompaniment for films. Nothing is more sympathetic, more soothing or more emotional than one of these wonderful organs played by an artist."

We agree with him in every particular. "Can" the poor orchestras, "can" the bad operators, "can" the insulting ushers, "can" the inferior organist, in fact, "can" everybody who is not capable. There is no room for mediocrity in any branch of the picture industry. But this does not mean that the "day of the small orchestras has passed." Good orchestras are needed in the picture theaters, and are here to stay. What is needed more than anything else is a thorough understanding regarding its makeup, acoustic propensities, and duties, in fitting the picture.

The best class of house, one which can afford it, use both organ and orchestra with wonderful success. Those unable to maintain both have found that a good solo pianist can give sufficient variety to the orchestral ensemble and play the comedy or review while the orchestra rests. Many theaters have gained splendid results from the use of a harmonium as an instrument in a small combination, and for the benefit of those who have not tried this we offer the following suggestion: Secure a good orchestra of seven men along the lines of the following instrumentation:

Violinist conductor, first violin-obligato, cello, flute, clarinet, harmonium and piano.

They should play the show in the following manner:

Overture by the complete orchestra, scenic—part way with orchestra and finish with piano alone. Orchestra rests in the pit. Pictorial review, by the complete orchestra. Open the feature with the orchestra, including the piano, and allow the harmonium player to rest 10 minutes. When the pathetic scenes of the picture are shown make the harmonium player take them alone, resting the orchestra and pianist for 10 minutes (out of the pit), returning to finish the picture. The pianist should handle the comedy alone.

This routine system has proved most efficacious in many small theaters and is well worth trying. The harmonium gives the necessary fullness to the small orchestra, taking the place of the brass instruments. It adds double volume if needed and knits the orchestra together in a perfect ensemble. An organ will do the same function and is an instrument more adaptable to solo playing, but frequently beyond the purse of the small exhibitor.

If three pieces are used in an orchestra and are good there is ample variety of color to please the most fastidious ear. The acoustic properties of every house should receive a thorough test before finally settling the subject of an orchestra or organ. Some theaters will not benefit by an organ or large orchestra, some cannot use brass, others need it. No one can tell offhand what the musical requirements of any theater are without taking into consideration first, the acoustics of the auditorium; second, the possibilities in securing good musicians; third, the class of program offered, and fourth, the clientele to please.

Music at the Strand.

During the week commencing March 24 the music of the Strand took on a distinctly operative flavor mixed with Easter atmosphere. As usual, the entire performance was smooth and well-handled, special attention being paid to lighting effects. A back-drop representing the stained glass window of a church was most appropriate for the week, while the singing of "Les Rameaux" by Faure fitted the sanctity of Palm Sunday.

Robespierre Overture—by Litoff—was a bit uncertain in its first performance. The arrangement used was the original, written for a full symphony orchestra, and seemed thin with the smaller combination. Nevertheless, great credit is due Conductor Spirescu and the Strand orchestra for the rendition given. It is a big work to handle, and considering the paucity of men used it was remarkable how well it was interpreted.

We noted the waltz-lento number used in the topical review, which was a distinct change from the rushing marches needed for the balance of the pictorial.

Henry Miller, a bass baritone, sang the "Sergeant of the Line"—by Squires—and "The Palms"—by Faure. Mr. Miller seemed somewhat nervous in his first number, but showed to better advantage in his second. His enunciation is faulty and his habit of blasting his upper tones detract from an otherwise good voice. His mezzo voce proved exceptionally pleasing.

The feature picture, presenting Pauline Fredericks in La Tosca, was preceded by the prelude to the opera written by Puccini. Mr. Puccini and his managers, Ricordi Bros., are intensely businesslike, and consider the playing of the opera during the showing of the picture as an infringement of their copyright. They demand royalties if it is done, maintaining that the action (though silent) and the music constitutes a performance of the opera.

In spite of the handicap Carl Edouarde gave the picture a wonderful musical setting, using excerpts from other operas and big symphonic numbers to portray the dramatic emotions. Especially fine was the music used during the torture scene. We are so glad that a cheap hurry was not played for this big moment of the picture. The church-bell effects, bugle calls, muffled snare drum and gun shots were artistically handled and added to the picture.

The climax of this picture comes at the end with a quickening tempo to the finish. The music did not carry it. Instead of working up to a big finale as La Tosca confesses her guilt, is shot by the guards, and falls over the parapet, the music portrayed no agitation and stopped abruptly in the middle of a phrase. This is too good a setting to warrant such a disappointing finish and we feel sure that patrons attending the second performance were better treated.

"Ah Fors E Lui" (from Traviata) was sung by Miss Grace Hoffman. This song has become perennial with Miss Hoffman, but her delivery of it is always welcomed. Her work is too well and favorably known to require lengthy comment.

The usual comedy and organ solo closed one of the most pleasing shows we have seen.

Musical Suggestion Synopsis.

AN AMERICAN LIVE WIRE (Blue Ribbon—Five Reels)—Theme for the Hero—Allegretto. Suggest "Pirouette"—Finck, "La Colombe"—Gounod, or "Punchinella"—Herbert.

This O. Henry yarn will need only the lightest of music. Choose light opera selections, such as "The Tourist"—Kerler, or "Yankee Counsel"—Cohen. A few agitados, hurrys and misteriosos will fit. Catch the Spanish atmosphere and use numbers as "Chicana"—Demorest, "El Albaicin"—Valverde, "Mercedes Waltz"—Miro, "La Paloma"—Yradler, "Memories of Spain"—Silverberg. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Vitagraph Exchange.

BELL BOY, THE (Paramount—Two Reels)—Theme for Fatty—Allegro. Suggest "Tete-a-tete"—de Koven, "Tale of Two Hearts"—Roberts, or "Rustic Dance"—Leigh.

A good comedy with lightning speed that calls for snappy music. Rube stuff can be used to good effect in this picture. No cue sheets available.

BRASS CHECK, THE (Metro—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Valse Lento. Suggest "Kathleen"—Berg, "Sleeping Rose"—Borch, or "Destiny"—Baynes.

The character of the picture is comedy-drama with city atmosphere. Light intermezzos, serenades and ballet music is required in quantities. Bell effects should be noted, as they add to the humor of the picture. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Metro Exchange.

CURSE OF IKU, THE (Essanay—Seven Reels)—Theme—Andante. Suggest "Ladies Picking Mulberries"—Kelley, "Arabian Nights"—Mildenberg, or "Japanese Love Song"—Bartlett.

The picture is dramatic, the atmosphere almost entirely Japanese and the situations big. Our best suggestion is that you see the picture. A partial list of good Japanese selections may help the leader and are offered for the purpose of enlarging his library, if he so desires. "Japanese Patrol" (March)—by Tobani, "Veil Dance" (Ballet)—

Friml, "Jap's Tattoo" (March)—Lawrence; "Fuji Koe" (Intermezzo)—by Shealey, "The Bombardment" (March)—by Heed, "Japanese Reveries" (Andantino)—by Bartlett, "The Kingdom of Flowers" (Valse)—by Ringleben, "Poppies" (Romance)—by Moret, "A Night in Japan" (Suite)—by Braham, "Japanese Sunset" (Meditation)—by Zamznick.

DAUGHTER OF FRANCE, A (Fox—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Plaintive Andante. Suggest "Pleading"—Wood, "Souvenir"—Gehrl, or "Au Matin"—Goddard.

Another war picture calling for much martial music. In the first reel select a rustic number of French atmosphere. Note the one-step necessary for the dance in the second, and play the Marseillaise Hymn in the fifth at T—"I am a daughter of France." Cue sheets can be obtained from the Fox Exchange.

MY FOUR YEARS IN GERMANY ("My Four Years in Germany," Inc.—Eight Reels).

This is a stirring patriotic picture that needs a score to fully represent the kaleidoscopic scenes. Many marches, patriotic pieces, dramatics and battle agitados will be required. A special orchestra score, arranged by Meyer Bros., will be available for the presentation of this picture.

PAIR OF SIXES, A (Essanay—Six Reels)—Theme for Boggs—Moderato. Suggest "Serenade"—Widor, "Serenade"—Lindon, or "Berceuse"—Schytte.

This is a comedy-drama. Use light and popular music. Intermezzos, serenades, two-steps, etc. No dramatic situation arises nor is there a call for "weepy" music.

KNIFE, THE (Select Pictures—Six Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Andante. Suggest "Love Theme"—Hertzberg, "Yesterdays"—Huerter, or "Where the Cool Moss Grows"—Helm.

The picture is dramatic. Dramatic tensions, misteriosos, hurrys, and agitados will find a place in your setting. Make the big stuff as long as possible to avoid a choppy presentation. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Select Exchange.

CLAIM, THE (Metro—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Moderato and Scotch. Suggest "Annie Laurie" or "Comin' Thro' the Rye."

The picture is dramatic, the atmosphere Western, and the situations big. Catch the dance hall scenes at T—"The years that passes"—and use a popular one-step with a Mexican flavor if possible. On flash backs play pp, continuing this selection to the point where Belle sings. The early part of the feature needs a sombre fitting, but brightens up in the fourth and fifth reel. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Metro Exchange.

THIEVES' GOLD (Universal—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Andante. Suggest "Berceuse"—Danby, "Lullaby"—Foley, or "Dialogue"—Meyer Helmund.

Western music, that "avis rara," is needed here. Use all the Mexican stuff possible and keep pace with the fast action. Use the theme only in the love scenes. Dramatic tensions are needed with a few hurrys and agitados. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Universal Exchange.

WAY OUT, THE (World—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Andantino. Suggest "Serenade"—Jeffery, "Yesterdays"—Huerter, or "Yesterlove"—Borch.

Note the change of atmosphere from America to France and prepare for it. The French music selected should be typical to emphasize the transition. Catch the battle scene toward the finish. Cue sheets can be obtained from the World Exchange.

WINE GIRL, THE (Bluebird—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Italian Folk Song. Suggest "O Sole Mio" or "Marguerite."

Heavy music of dramatic quality is needed; many Italian numbers of characteristic nature. Misteriosos are required in quantities. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Universal Exchange.

Questions Answered—Suggestions Offered.

Q. The owner of our theater is continually complaining because we repeat so much on our numbers. I am in a small town without facilities for buying up-to-date music. How can I learn about the latest issues of new stuff?

A. If you will send your name to G. Schirmer, Inc.; Carl Fischer Co., of New York; Oliver Ditson, and the Boston Music Co., of Boston; Sam Fox, of Cleveland, we are sure that their publicity department will keep you informed regarding new music.

Q. It seems that I don't ever get through my work in the theater. What with arranging the settings, viewing the picture, looking after my library, and playing at both performances I haven't a minute to myself. How can I make the work lighter?

A. Have one of your orchestra boys installed as librarian. Arrange your settings for piano only, and have him add the other instruments, using the piano as a guide. See that your library is properly classified and easy of access.

Q. What constitutes an infringement of a copyrighted number, and how many bars of any number may be used without infringing?

A. Reprinting, transferring or any form of reproduction is an infringement of a copyright. Anything less than seven bars is permissible.

Q. My leader, who is also a singer, insists upon playing song numbers as he would interpret them vocally instead of as orchestrated, with the result that the other musicians in our orchestra are always out of gibe, never knowing what liberties he is going to take. Isn't he all wrong?

A. Songs are seldom suitable to the scenes of a picture, as they usually have a different association of ideas and usually detract from the scene. Only as the theme should they be used, when the idea of the song coincides with the emotion depicted. There is no reason why the orchestra should be out of gibe if they follow the leader's beat.

Color in Picture Playing.

MUSIC for the pictures is essentially interpretative; it must never rise above the situations depicted; but lie just below them, carrying them upon its billowy crest. The art of portraying pictures musically has advanced wonderfully and is now a fine art. It requires more than music knowledge, picture experience and broad intelligence. It calls for genius and a psychological intuition that senses the proper moment to change the coloring of the orchestra.

In the early days of the silent drama we were wont to see pictures thrown upon the screen in black and white. No tinting of film was known. No matter how beautifully photographed, the scenes, following one after the other, with no tint effects, became monotonous to the eye of the esthetic. Today that condition has become a thing of the past and film tinting calls for research work and expertness. New tints are sought after and, when found, conscripted into picture service.

An evening scene calls for blue tints if it be exterior and yellow or orange if interior. Different scenes are treated differently, according to well set rules, with the object of bringing warmth and life into the picture. Every effort is put forth to make the screened objects appear natural to the eye, at the same time giving variety of tonal vision.

In picture playing we are still only in the black and white period. A few of the more advanced leaders are dabbling in colors, but the way is open for freer development and more progress along these lines.

The orchestra is composed of four distinct divisions, namely, the string section, composing violins, violi, celli, bassi and harp; the wood-wind section, made up of piccolo, flute, oboe, clarinets, cor Anglais, bassoon and contra-bassoon, while the brass section is composed of trumpets, French horns, trombones and tuba. The percussion department is represented by drums, kettle drums and cymbals. Traps, such as bells, xylophones, anvils, etc., are also classed in this division.

The wood-wind and brass are the color sections. Each instrument in these divisions is different in its tonal quality, yet wonderfully effective in the ensemble. One can readily realize the wide possibilities in tonal color to be derived from four separate sections, three of which can, at least, be divided again into four parts.

By using the strings alone we get two effects, legato (smooth sweet sounds) or pizzicato (sharp staccato sounds). If a weird or pathetic effect be desired the application of the mute serves the purpose admirably. Thus we gain three colors from the strings in the changed method of playing. Each instrument has three registers—the low, medium and upper—totally different in vibration and distinctly varied in color. This adds three more possibilities. Moreover, by a different arrangement of the strings, we get different shading of tone; for example, by giving the solo to the cello in its upper register the quality is broader than could be obtained from the violin, playing the same notes. Summing up we find the string section plastic, with a capacity for much varied color. With music properly arranged an orchestra of strings alone could present the picture without monotony to the ear.

Looking into the possibilities of the wood-wind instruments we find that as a separate division and playing together they carry all necessary voices for a good ensemble. Their use in this way would necessarily be infrequent because no music of any length has been so arranged that it could be used for practical purposes without drawing on instruments from other departments. There are many bits or excerpts from selections that are excellent examples of the wood-wind choir, such as the opening four bars of the Ruy Blas Overture, but we do not look to this section as a whole for change of color.

It is the peculiar individuality of the wood-wind instruments and their use as soloists accompanied by the other sections that goes far to change the color of the music. The quality of the flute is entirely different from that of the oboe in its mellow richness. The latter has a piercing effect, more shrill than the clarinet. The bassoon is the bass foundation of the wood-wind family, being sombre in tone and yet grotesque in some passages. Though the oboe, clarinets, English horn and bassoon are reed instruments they differ materially in quality. Their proper use in their three registers brings into play colors that cannot be duplicated in any other section.

The brass instruments, used in a separate mass or in combination with strings or wood, not only give a new tone-color to the orchestra, but greatly increase its power. Their frequent employment, unless managed with great judgment, is likely to produce an effect of noise; and there is no department of the orchestra so liable to abuse at the hands of an inexperienced leader. At the same time, if properly and carefully treated, these instruments add a richness to the instrumental mass which can be obtained in no other way.

The timpani and drums are peculiarly effective in adding color to the general tone but must be used with discretion. The constant clapping of cymbals and snare drum is in bad taste and nauseating to the lover of pure music. And, furthermore, by a discreet use of percussion the foundation of the orchestral mass is further solidified.

The varied treatment of theme is a new idea that is finding favor among both musicians and patrons. The continual reiteration of the theme by the same instrument with the same accompaniment becomes monotonous and disagreeable. It is not feasible to alter the accompaniment, but the melody is usually cued in other parts and perfectly easy of performance. Upon the scene fitted depends the choice of instrument as soloist. Brightness is exemplified by the violin, piccolo, or upper register of the flute and clarinet. Sadness is heard in the cello and French horn, while intense grief can readily be depicted by the bassoon or tuba. Plaintive melancholy is exactly portrayed by the oboe in its middle register and triumph finds expression in the trumpets and trombones.

In special musical scores for big pictures this treatment of the theme has already been successfully tried by the best experts. It has the added advantage of resting the soloists, lightening the work of the more important instruments. By a little forethought and some extraction of certain parts the idea is perfectly feasible for musical settings. In fact, it would obviate turning back to the theme in many cases.

Some scientists state that color sensation is a part of sound and gives the character or impression of the sound. All people feel it whether they consciously recognize it or not. In the same way, melodious sounds should give their character through impressions of harmonious combinations of pleasing colors. Again, color sensations may be translated into their vocal sounds, thereby giving color to spoken words.

Perhaps it was because Wagner loved color so much in life that we find so much color in his music. He stands the pre-eminent colorist among composers. We can well understand his saying, "I must have beauty, light and color," and that he received all three is evinced in the beauty and color of his musical writings.

Recently symphonies have been played accompanied by color effects supposed to represent the composer's thought. Sounds have been classified in colors and so tabulated. It indicates the trend of thought in this direction. Who can say that it's the product of the fevered brain of the extremist?

INNOCENT'S PROGRESS, THE (Triangle—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Dramatic Andante. Suggest "Last Spring"—Grieg, "Last Dream of the Virgin"—Massenet, or "Evening Devotion"—Kohler. The opening should be light music followed by storm furiosos and dramatic stuff. Some Pathetics will be needed later, the last reel being especially sad. Note the train effects in the second reel and the need of wind and rain machines during the storm scenes. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Triangle Exchange.

LANDLOPER, THE (Metro—Five Reels)—Theme for the Hero—Andante. Suggest "Dialogue"—Meyer-Helmund, "Intermezzo"—Whelpley, or "In Roseland"—Eugene.

One popular one-step, a few dramatic tensions, some pastorale music and one misterioso will play the picture. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Metro Exchange.

NAUGHTY, NAUGHTY (Paramount—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Allegretto. Suggest "Butterflies"—Steinke, "Dew Drops"—Armstrong, or "La Colombe"—Gounod.

Note the church scene in this comedy, and a bit of classic dancing. Otherwise the entire picture can be played with light opera selections. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paramount Exchange.

Music at Fox's Academy.

During the week commencing March 31 we visited the Academy of Music, run as a high class picture house by William Fox. It is a wonderful auditorium for the presenting of the silent drama, but a bit out of the way for metropolitan patrons. The acoustics are especially good in this theater, and we were surprised to find the piping for the grand organ misplaced in such a manner as to deprive the audience of the full benefit of the music. The organist, Mr. Robert Behrns, seems to be very capable, and no doubt under different auspices would acquit himself in a masterly manner. Acoustics play a large part in the proper placing of organ and orchestra. The placing of the French horns behind the trumpets and just in front of the drums is distinctly faulty, while the bassoon is too far back in the center to prove effective when called upon.

Conductor Fred Quintrell has an orchestra of thirty-two men to work with, and, though individually the material is rather below the average, he obtains good ensemble effects. His phrases are very clean cut and crescendos musicianly, yet the attack is anything but perfect. The rendition of "Slavish Rhapsodie," by Friedman, was deservedly well received by the patrons. The orchestra was held well in hand, and responded to his baton with promptness and precision.

The widely advertised "Tarzan of the Apes" was the feature shown. It was fitted by the organ with the assistance of the orchestra at odd intervals. For the orchestra it seemed to be a dress rehearsal. The entire setting was choppy and not always in good taste. The picture is in three chapters, or episodes, all of which were opened with the organ, with the exception of the first. No deep thought had been given its presentation, and we question its rehearsal. We suggest that the orchestra rests be more appropriately selected and less organ solo used during the feature.

"The Only Girl," by Herbert, was played as a selection in a manner purely lackadaisical. This piece is too well known to fool with, and Mr. Quintrell cannot afford to jeopardize his reputation as a musician by such a slovenly rendition.

During the playing of the comedy for some unknown reason the orchestra suddenly switched off the one-step it was playing and segued into a valse lento for sixteen measures, returning to a two-step immediately. We cudged our alleged brain for this peculiar transition. A little later there came a flash scene of classic dancers. The orchestra missed the cue, and was entirely too late for the flash of the ballet. The interests of the picture had been better served if they had disregarded the flash entirely.

This theater seems to have fallen behind in the march of progress. The picture presentation is of the vintage of 1915, and has none of the ear marks of the new and up-to-date methods.

Musical Suggestion Synopsis.

ANSWER, THE (Triangle—Five Reels)—Theme—Andante. Suggest "Heart Wounds"—Grieg, "Elysium"—Speaks, or "La Melancholie"—Prume.

This picture needs careful treatment as there is a change of location that must be considered. Most of the music required will be dramatics, but during the second reel light numbers will fit. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Triangle Exchange.

HILLCREST MYSTERY, THE (Astra—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Andantino. Suggest "Consolation"—Liszt, "Serenade"—Czernonsky, or "Venetian Romance"—Hildreth.

This is a mystery and detective story. Many agitados, hurrys and misteriosos will be required. If possible use the first movement of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony beginning at the second reel. The selection from "La Forza del Destino"—Verdi, will also be found fitting in the last reel. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Pathe Exchange.

HONOR OF HIS HOUSE, THE (Paramount—Five Reels)—Theme for the Hero—Andante and Japanese. Suggest "Fuji Ko"—Shelley, "Japanese Reverie"—Bartlett, or "Japanese Sunset"—Zamznick. American atmosphere changes to South Sea Islands, to Japan, then to India. Note these, and treat the changes musically to enhance the picture. A beautiful chance is given in this feature to use Oriental music of the best order. It is dramatic throughout, and should be seen to perfect a proper setting. The cue sheets issued by Paramount do not properly convey the atmosphere if the leader be forced to substitute numbers.

NANCY COMES HOME (Triangle—Five Reels)—Theme—Andantino. Suggest "Love Theme"—Lee, "Premier D'Amour"—Benoit, or "Melodie"—Lederer.

Neutral music is required. Not the popular jig music immediately followed by shot effect in the fourth reel. The finish of the feature is very heavy, and demands dramatics, pathetics and agitados. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Triangle Exchange.

RED, RED HEART, THE (Bluebird—Five Reels)—Theme for the Hero—Andante and Oriental. Suggest "The Arab's Dream"—Kendall, "Luleta's Dance"—Ring, "Aisha"—Lindsay.

Western music will play a large part in the fitting of this picture. Use American stuff, and the Oriental theme will add the necessary touch of flavor and spice. Note the big fight scene and the many pursuits. It is nearly all dramatic depiction, and should be so treated. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Universal Exchange.

RICH MAN'S DARLING, A (Bluebird—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Valse Intermezzo. Suggest "Springtime"—Drumm, "Valse Poudree"—Poppy, or "Valse Desmoiselles"—Frml.

The picture is light in the main; but a few dramatic situations crop up to add zest to the rather thin plot. A couple of Spanish numbers can be used to portray husband Ricardo. Light Allegrettos, Serenades, melodious Andantinos and a couple of rube numbers will fill the setting. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Universal Exchange.

SPIRIT OF THE RED CROSS, THE (Town & Country Films—Two Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Andante. Suggest "Extase"—Ganne, "Melody of Peace"—Martin, or "Nocturne"—Karganoff.

Battle scenes abound in this propaganda picture. Use "Onward Christian Soldiers" in its march form wherever occasion arises. No cue sheet available.

VORTEX, THE (Triangle—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Andante Sostenuto. Suggest "Romance"—Karanoff, "Twilight"—Cesek, or "Reverie"—Rissland.

Dramatic music will predominate in this picture. The feature runs smoothly and does not require any special effects. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Triangle Exchange.

Leaders' Service Bureau.

QUESTIONS ANSWERED—SUGGESTIONS OFFERED.

Q. Please suggest a good title for a paraphrased burial hymn for the "Beast of Berlin."

A. Autocracy Entombed.

Q. "Has the present world conflict inspired any songs that compare with 'Dixie,' 'Maryland, My Maryland,' 'The Battle Cry of Freedom,' etc? I mean are there any songs now published on the present war that will live down through history as the above and which could almost be considered 'National'?"

A. "So far we have not seen any evidence of it unless our popular song 'Over There' will stand the test and live. It is too early to feel the influence of the war in connection with music."

Q. "Do you believe in fitting a picture with familiar popular music that the patrons can whistle and hum, or giving them an overdose of heavy classics?"

A. "It depends on the picture. Vary your program, using light and familiar music in the scenic or comedy, preferably that which has a bearing on the scene. In the feature it is wise to use music of the better order which is unfamiliar unless you have a direct cue or a specific reason for doing otherwise."

Q. "During these war times would you suggest having the 'Star Spangled Banner' played at every performance each day so as to keep your patrons alive to the fact that we are at war and to keep the flame of patriotism aglow?"

A. "The majority of theaters do not play the 'Star Spangled Banner' at every performance, but open the first show of the day with it. There is always the danger of antagonizing the most ardent and patriotic patron of your house by forcing them out of their seats frequently. In this connection we would strongly advise discretion be used in the playing of it during the feature. Use 'Dixie,' 'Yankee Doodle,' or something else, if possible."

Cue Sheets Again.

MR. PRODUCER.—Music has become a matter of vital importance, which you fully realize. It can no longer be overlooked nor judged lightly as a powerful force in the presentation of pictures. For the benefit of the exhibitor you are providing musical cue sheets as an aid to his leader in preparing proper music to fit your feature.

We believe in your sincerity. We know that you are spending money for this service. We appreciate the fact that notwithstanding the tremendous volume of routine matter passing through your office you have voluntarily added to it cue sheet distribution. Are you getting the results expected? Are you receiving value for your money invested? Is the music leader being properly served? Are you keeping in close touch with this phase of your business?

The complaints from the leaders throughout the country have been numerous, and upon thorough investigation we found that in the main they were justified. It is not our intention to disqualify the musicians who are arranging your cue sheets. That part of the discontentment lies without our province, but we feel that you will be interested to know the facts relative to the actual distribution of the musical suggestions.

One thing seems plain. You are not printing sufficient cue sheets to go around. Accurate data shows that leaders have requested cue sheets two weeks after release date, and found the supply exhausted. Few, if any of you, provide this service three months after release date. Why?

The general method of distribution seems to be one of "passing the buck." You print the cue sheets, and send them in quantities to each of your exchanges. Sometimes they are attached to the press sheets or other publicity matter. The exchange delivers them to their exhibitor by mail, reel boy, or hand—if they don't forget it. The exhibitor tries to get them into the hands of his leader. Of course we all know how much idle time hangs heavily upon the exhibitor, and, amid the tons of publicity matter that is dumped on his desk daily, he gaily seeks first, the elusive cue sheet.

Without insulting your intelligence by going further into the many possibilities of miscarriage you can readily understand that by the time the cue sheet has passed through three offices and thirty hands there is every likelihood of the leader NOT getting it. If he does it will be probably a week after he has played the picture.

This seems to lie without your jurisdiction, and in a sense does, but fundamentally you are responsible for the service. If it is non-productive, as the facts would seem to indicate, the duty is yours to adopt a more efficient system of distribution. Drop a couple of links in the chain and put yourself in direct contact with the leader. He will appreciate the courtesy, and you insure your picture perfect presentation musically.

MR. EXCHANGE MANAGER.—What would your exhibitor say if he could not secure lobby display, posters, heralds, throw-aways and other accessories that go to make a picture show? Could you hold his business for your firm? Hardly.

Musical cue sheets are needed by the orchestral leaders, organists, and pianists throughout your district. Are you making sure that they get them with ease and despatch?

The following example may not fit your office, but the facts are true:

A certain leader went to a certain exchange to obtain a cue sheet for a super feature production which was booked for his house. No one in the exchange could tell him anything about a musical suggestion sheet, and he was forced to go back without it. The exhibitor, as it happened, was progressive, and took great pride in his music. He went to the exchange, and, after being shunted about from one employee to the other with no satisfactory results, he gained audience with the president of the company and got his cue sheet. But he had to sign a receipt for it, after wasting two hours of his time in futile search.

This seems preposterous and ridiculous, but we can vouch for its truth. Your office may be a bit negligent in promptly passing out cue sheets as they arrive. Get in touch with the situation. Eliminate the exhibitor as a medium of distribution of the cue sheets by requesting the name of his leader and placing him on your mailing list. It is good business on your part, and your exhibitor will appreciate it.

MR. EXHIBITOR.—Good music in your theater means added box office receipts. Your music leader, organist, or pianist cannot fit a picture (which he has not seen) from the air. He needs cue sheets. To the average musician, system is distasteful, but if he has some way of procuring his cue sheets regularly, and systematically he will overcome his natural tendency for slipshod methods and keep a proper file for musical suggestions.

When cue sheets arrive, whether separately or attached to publicity, see to it that he gets them promptly. You will be doing yourself a service by installing a letter box for matter that pertains to your orchestra and giving your leader ready access thereto.

MR. LEADER.—Through these columns of the Moving Picture World we are trying to help you. From practical experience we know the work you are called upon to do. We appreciate the position you occupy, and all our resources are placed at your disposal. We recognize you as a big component part of the picture industry, using your art to further its interests, and equally as important as any other branch of the business.

In our campaign for better distribution of cue sheets we want to hear from every musician in the country using this service. Tell us your troubles in a short and concise manner, and, though we may not be able to reply to all, you can rest assured that you have done your "bit" in furthering a proper system of cue sheet service.

Don't hesitate to tell your house manager what you are up against. He will lend a willing ear and helping hand, for he appreciates your value in his scheme of showmanship. Cue sheet suggestions are provided for your use, and you are entitled to them, not two weeks after playing the picture, but sufficiently in advance of the booking to give you time to prepare a musical setting. Let us hear from you on this subject at once. Let us strike together while the iron is hot and get the prompt service originally intended.

Music for "Hearts of the World."

We attended the opening of "Hearts of the World" at the 44th Street theater knowing full well that anything emanating from that master of film craft, D. W. Griffith, would be worth seeing and hearing. In spite of our mental preparedness we were completely overwhelmed by the beautiful presentation. We cannot eulogize the picture as we would like to, because it would be usurping the privilege of another, but we take pleasure in stating that it was a musical treat of the highest order. No picture within our ken has been so well set to music, not only melodiously, but thoughtfully.

The score for "Hearts of the World" properly refutes the misguided musical cynics who claim there can be no accurate synchrony. It is a definite denunciation of those cavilling and alleged artists who believe that music is prostituted by its association with pictures. It is a triumph of lights and shadows, a masterpiece of orchestral coloring, and a glowing example of theme treatment. Let every producer who heretofore has taken little stock in musical scores hear this one, and his lack of interest will become real enthusiasm.

Mr. Griffith attends to every detail of his picture presentation, and to him must be given the credit for the music also. His able assistant, Mr. Carl Elinor, synchronized the score, using the themes suggested by him. The entire setting is arranged on the thematic system, that is, a theme is given to each important character, and repeated whenever that character is in the foreground. Under ordinary conditions and without careful thought this system would produce a monotonous melange, but when each repetition is differently treated it becomes characteristically operatic. These themes are almost made to speak; they tell the action so graphically. The instrumentation of each arrangement is changed according to the mood depicted, and one does not need to watch the scene to tell who is acting or what they are doing. Many of these role calls only last a few seconds, but are neatly interwoven and in perfect key sequence.

We fully realize and appreciate the colossal task undertaken by Mr. Griffith and his musical associate in putting together such a score, but we do not understand why no music was provided for the prologue nor for the parliamentary scenes, both English and French. The use of the agitato portion of the overture from "La Forza Del Destino"—Verdi—was a bit weak for the battle scene, and became a valley amid the mountains of sound.

The paraphrasing of the Marseillaise was very weird and distinctly bad from the theoretical standpoint of music. In fact the paraphrasing part of the score seems to have fallen into poor hands. The dramatic situations received a grandioso treatment that we usually associate with the emotion called triumphant. However, that is a matter of opinion, and does not in any way detract from the real worth of the score.

Wonderful as the picture undoubtedly is, it is enhanced materially by its musical accompaniment. The music portrays minutely every emotion depicted. There are no breaks, nor irritating clashes of keys. It is well balanced instrumentally, and cheap "hurrys" find no place in the galaxy of the works of the old masters. With the exception of the paraphrasing the arranging has been done by one who thoroughly understands the needs of the scene, and the possibilities of his instruments.

The blending of "Connais-tu le Pays," the theme for the Girl and the Boy, with "Peek-a-Boo," signifying the little Brother, was unique, and fitted the situation. "Ciribiribim" suited Monsieur Cuckoo in nationality and temperament. "Just a Little Love, a Little Kiss" also plays an important part in depicting that emotion. Taking the score by and large we can safely say that it excels even that criterion of scores, "The Birth of a Nation," and its runners up, "Ramona" and "Eyes of the World."

Music at the Rivoli.

These certainly are the halcyon days for picture music. During the week of March 31 we visited the Rivoli to hear Maeterlinck's "Blue Bird" as presented by Mr. S. L. Rothapfel.

The overture, "Selections from La Boheme," by Puccini, has little real depth, and only takes in the more popular arias from the opera. Mr. Reisenfeld made much of it. His command of his orchestra is superb, his little artistic touches lend grace, while his attacks and finishes are most exacting. After hearing this number so frequently misplayed it was delightful to listen to a thoughtful rendition. The climax came at the end with a tumult of sound and an abrupt finish that brought a spontaneous round of applause from the audience.

Jeanne Gordon, the contralto, sang an excerpt from "The Masked Ball," by Verdi, assisted by a tableau of young women. This number was done in costume, with very effective lighting, and Miss Gordon proved to have a splendid voice, well trained, but a little short in range for this big number. Mr. Rubenstein directed the orchestra in a most capable manner.

Then came the real treat. Opening with a characteristic prelude that told of the mysteries of the unknown the curtain rose. Two veiled garbed damsels slowly came into view, with raised hands and uplifted faces, emblematic of desire of knowledge. A back drop showed a rugged mountain with the sun just peeping over the top. The red and blue lighting was wonderfully realistic. The screen dropped, and "The Blue Bird" was projected.

The musical setting to this picture was the best that we have heard. Much thought and weeks of preparation must have been given to this feature by the musical staff of the Rivoli, for it showed in every detail. At the place showing the party at the rich girl's home part of the orchestra played behind the scenes most effectively. The special themes used for the cat, sugar, bread, etc., were well chosen, and fitted most appropriately. As the two children accompanied by their retinue swung into the air the glissando strings portrayed the action beautifully. The graveyard and the banquet situations were admirably handled, and the chorus work back stage for the scene showing the expectant mothers was an innovation duly appreciated. The music alone was well worth the price of admission, and was favorably commented upon by the patrons.

Musical Suggestion Synopsis.

BOSS OF THE LAZY "Y" (Triangle—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Allegretto. Suggest "Chanson Sans Parole"—Tchaikowsky, "In a Garden"—Sudds, or "La Colombe"—Gounod.

Opens up dramatically, note the shot, and use agitato stuff. Many misteriosos and hurrys are needed in this picture. Drama predominates, and the Western atmosphere must be maintained as far as possible. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Triangle Exchange.

BREAKERS AHEAD (Metro—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Moderato or Andantino. Suggest "Serenade D'Amour"—Blon, "Wild Rosebud"—Tobani, or "Ashore"—Trotter.

This picture shows the simple life of a fishing village on the New England coast, and is pathetic throughout. The selection from the "Pearl Fishers" opera will fit in nicely. Note the need of the Wedding March, and catch the big storm scene, using "Scotch Poem," by MacDowell, if possible. Cut the Moderato portion of sixteen bars, as it will break your effect. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Metro Exchange.

LIFE MASK, THE (Petrova—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Dramatic Andante. Suggest "Heart Wounds"—Grieg, "Lost Happiness"—Eilenberg, or "Dawn of Hope"—Cassella.

The character of the picture is dramatic in the extreme. Note the change of atmosphere from America to Spain. For the Spanish touch we would suggest using—

"Camen Overture".....Bizet
 "Cordova".....Luscomb
 "Bim-bims".....Adam
 "La Fete de Seville".....Marchetti
 "Memories of Spain".....Silverberg
 "Spanish Dances".....Moskowski
 "Spanish Serenade".....Friml

HOUSE OF SILENCE (Paramount—Five Reels)—Theme—Allegretto. Suggest "Serenade"—Lange-Miller, "A Little Story"—Lack, or "Serenade"—Drdla.

Try to get "Valse Triste," by Sibelius, and use it as a second theme. Catch the fight scene and the police round-up just before the finish. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paramount Exchange.

HEARTS OF THE WORLD (Griffith Superfeature). See detailed account in another column of this department.

MAGIC EYE, THE (Universal—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Allegretto. Suggest "Idilio"—Lack, "Serenade"—Frommel, or "A Spring Morn"—Morris.

Another fishers' village picture. Marine numbers such as "Out on the Deep," by Petri; "When the Bell in the Light House," "Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep," "Davy Jones' Locker," and other similar ballads will fit into this setting splendidly. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Universal Exchange.

MILE-A-MINUTE KENDALL (Paramount—Five Reels)—Theme—Valse Lente. Suggest "Sympathy"—Friml, "Destiny"—Baynes, or "Auf Wiederseh'n"—Romberg.

Light operatic selections well chosen and pieced together will make a superb setting for this picture. Get the explosion in the first reel, the smashups in the third, and the auto motor effects in the last. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paramount Exchange.

PLAYING THE GAME (Paramount—Five Reels)—Theme—Tempo di Valse. Suggest "Les Idoles"—Allier, "Heartstrings"—Vecsey, or "Bonds of Love"—Roth.

The story is Western in atmosphere and bright in the main. Allegretto music will predominate. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paramount Exchange.

RISKY ROAD, THE (Universal—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Andante. Suggest "Arioso"—Frey, "In Roseland"—Eugene, or "Melody of Peace"—Martin.

Pathetic and plaintive melodies should play the important parts of this picture. There are a couple of agitados needed. The dramatic phase is light, and a few allegrettos, serenades and serenatas will add contrast to the general tone. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Universal Exchange.

ROUGH AND READY (Fox—Six Reels)—Theme for the Hero—Andante. Suggest "In Lover's Lane"—Pryor, "Melodie"—Tchaikowsky, or "Nocturnal Piece"—Schumann.

To open this picture use a Medley of Christmas Carols or "Blessing, Glory, and Wisdom," by Tours. Note the fox-trot in the first reel, the two-step in the second, the agitato followed by a hurry in the fourth. A few dramatic numbers will be required, and for contrast many allegrettos. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Fox Exchange.

TWENTY-ONE (Pathe—Five Reels)—Theme for the Hero—Caprice or Gavotte. Suggest "Cupid's Pranks"—Stahl, "Menuet"—Paderewski, or "Captivating"—Tobani.

Comedy music of a good order is needed. One-steps, two-steps, fox-trots, and waltz intermezzos will fit the picture. One good, light operatic selection would add materially to the worth of the setting. Note the prizefight, and use an agitato. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Pathe Exchange.

WITCH WOMAN, THE (World—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Andante. Suggest "Adoration"—Barnard, "Causerie"—Macmillen-Borch, or "Serenade"—Tosti.

The character of the picture is dramatic. Located in the Alsatian Mountain, period of the present day. Note the Bohemian scenes in Paris, and use Apache stuff. Catch the clock chimes at "D—Marie is laid on couch," and shot effect at "T—You're both fools." A few agitados are necessary towards the finish of the picture. Cue sheets can be obtained from the World Film Exchange.

Questions Answered—Suggestions Offered.

Q. "Are mandolins, banjos, ukeleles, guitars, etc., classed as 'string' instruments in the sense we speak of 'strings,' 'wood-wind,' 'brass,' etc., and have they any place in a 'movie' orchestra?"

A. "These are not generally classed as 'strings,' but fall under the heading of the plectum instruments, meaning strings which are plucked. Owing to their short range and similar color they are not as useful in any orchestra as instruments which are played by the bow. They would hardly do for pictures."

Q. "I've lost a great many of my men musicians through the 'Draft' and expect more vacancies soon. What do you think about using a ladies' orchestra? Can they do the same work?"

A. "A ladies' orchestra would be a good innovation providing you were able to get instrumentalists who were artists. We would suggest that you use a predominancy of wood-wind and strings, which are more easily obtained, and little of the brass, which is usually poor."

Q. "I have trouble with my 'brass' drowning out my 'strings.' If cornet uses mute he cannot be heard on the back seats—if he leaves it off you can hear nothing else but cornet. How can I remedy the trouble?"

A. "You might add more strings and get better artists in the brass section. No doubt your orchestra lacks balance. It may be the placing of your instruments that is at fault, or the acoustics of your house may not permit the use of brass. Tell me about the results after experimentation."

Q. "What are 'enharmonics'? Are they the same as 'harmonics'?"

A. "The word 'enharmonics' is incorrectly used as a noun. As an adjective—enharmonic—it means that a note, chord or key, though differently written, sounds the same to the ear. For example G flat is the enharmonic note of F sharp, the triad G flat, B flat, and D flat is the enharmonic triad of F sharp, A sharp, and C sharp, and the key of G flat (six flats) is the enharmonic of F sharp (six sharps). Harmonics are those so-called partial tones obtained on any string instrument (violin, zither, cello, etc.) by lightly touching a nodal point of a string."

Q. "What size orchestra would you suggest for a theater seating five hundred in a town of fifteen thousand population? In answering this please be governed by the fact that only about five per cent. of this population attend picture shows. My own competitor is using piano and drums."

A. "We would suggest a three piece orchestra composed of piano, violin and cello for your theater. Drums would be too noisy for such a small house, and for playing features are negligible. This will be a better combination than that of your opposition, and bring you more refined atmosphere."

The Organ a Mighty Factor in Presenting Pictures.

IN a recent issue we discussed the relative merits of the organ and orchestra for the express purpose of helping the exhibitor select a proper medium for his musical presentation, cautioning him regarding the placing of the organ, guiding him in his choice of organist and calling to his attention possible weak points in organ playing.

In an earlier issue we treated the orchestra to a close analytical inspection showing its possible flaws, also.

We desire to clearly state our position regarding both mediums of picture expression. Played together, by competent musicians, they become the highest form of picture presentation. Nothing can fill out the orchestra like an organ, neither can we find another instrument with such solo possibilities. The organ, well played, has a distinct advantage over the orchestra because of its smoothness in changing tempi and selections. No abrupt nor harsh changes of key are felt. No instrument has its varied color nor can an orchestra hope to show such swift changes of color.

We thoroughly believe in the organ, and exhibitors must not misconstrue our attitude. No disparagement of this noble instrument is meant when offering suggestions as to its use. When we use the velvet covered hammer upon some of the big orchestras, there is no rancor in the swing, but a desire for better musical results.

Be not misled. The organ is a mighty factor in the presentation of pictures. Our aim is better music for you and whatever medium you use (organ or orchestra), do it justice by procuring the best musicians available.

Light and Music.

Many exhibitors throughout the country possess beautiful theaters with the latest electrical devices. They have a perfect switch-board back stage, footlights, "spots" and "colors." They are careful to properly diffuse the light from the dome and side lamps. The exit signs receive much attention with a view to preventing a confection of refractory rays with good projection. Orchestra lights are not allowed to affect the screen and thought is given to the screen border lest it impair the projection lighting. Still there are exhibitors who do not take advantage of these facilities in enhancing their orchestral overture.

Music's first cousin is color, and light holds inherent within it many colors. Light is seen, sound is heard, and a linking of these powerful elements brings deeper comprehension. There is no fiction of action in a simultaneous use of the eye and ear. Proper lighting is interpretative to a remarkable degree and acts instantly upon our emotions. Greater interest is created in music if accompanied by varied lighting effects, synchronized to the changes of musical moods.

Imagination is strong within us, and everyone likes to visualize a scene musically described. Each will have a different mental picture so far as the details are concerned, and it is impossible to accurately portray those details, yet a suggestion of the dominant idea is quite practical. Back drops of atmospheric designs add greatly to the general tone of the music, and if clouds, stars, etc., are projected thereon, the scene becomes very realistic. By the further use of side projectors blue and red colors can be judiciously blended for specific effects, pleasing to the eye.

The overture, "Roumanian Poem," was recently given in the Strand of New York, using as a background a drop showing a placid lake, encircled with foliage. With the stage lights up the orchestra began the number. Slowly the lights faded, twilight came and blended into night. The moon rose from behind the foliage, clouds gathered, effacing the moon, and the storm began. Back-stage traps portrayed the thunder and rain while a side projector flashed lightning upon a dark stage. As the music rose higher, the flashing became more frequent and brighter; the thunder roared louder and the rain fell more heavily. As the music died down the thunder became more faint and gradually the storm ceased. The stage lights came up and later the entire theater was flooded with brightness typical of the sunlight again.

In the presenting of the "Blue Bird" at the Rivoli, Mr. Rothapfel opened with a drop made to take the form of a huge and barren mountain of untold height. It was a sombre drab gradually turning to blue. As the orchestra worked into a lighter vein, the sun slowly crept over the mountain top, diffusing a red glow. The screen descending brought that red down with it, which meant much to the thought behind it.

Happiness frequently is brought down to our plane if our hearts are ready to receive it.

Another theater used the screen as an additional aid to put over "William Tell" Overture. With house lights full and stage lights up the andante movement opened the overture. Gradually the dimmer brought the lights down as the movement progressed until the entire theater was in utter darkness when the orchestra reached the allegro. Then the storm began, intermittently at first, but increasing in force. Lightning flashed and thunder rolled. At this instant, a picture showing a dilapidated homestead being deluged with rain was projected upon the screen.

This made a pretty effect and concentrated the attention of the audience. As the storm died down the rain slowly diminished in the picture, the sun came out, and while the orchestra proceeded into the andante, we saw the sheep coming over the horizon. The scene was held until the finish of the movement, which brought the sheep and shepherd into a close-up, and faded out.

Immediately the allegro vivace was picked up by the orchestra. The lights slowly came up, and as the overture ended in a grand finale the theater was flooded with light. It provided real entertainment of a high-class order.

Nothing can be overlooked in the proper presentation of pictures, nor can one afford to merely depend upon the overture in its natural and usual form to win pleased patrons. Special lighting effects are comparatively inexpensive in operation and are within the reach of even the small exhibitor. The theater is a place of entertainment, primarily, and must keep pace in every department with the upward march of progress. Patrons look for novelties, and when you can give it to them in the form of an enhanced performance, thoughtfully prepared and brilliantly carried out, it is suicidal to overlook your opportunity.

Music at the Rialto.

Some shows are spectacular, some are grandiloquent, others are beautiful, but the performance given at the Rialto theater during the week commencing April 14 was decidedly PRETTY.

The overture, selections from Giaconda, was played as if every note meant something, and the usual excellent conducting of Hugo Reisenfeld accounted for it. The Rialto Chorus joined in the finale, and though adding little to the volume of sound, made a very pretty picture in their operatic costumes. This number was well received by the audience.

"The Clang of the Forge," rendered by Greek Evans, dressed as a blacksmith, was well staged, having the assistance of the Rialto Male Chorus and wonderful lighting effects. The first performance of this number showed need of a rehearsal in the ensemble singing and took away a degree of credit that should have gone to Mr. Evans. He possesses a wide range and pleases his listeners immensely. His stage presence is especially good.

Gloria Gale sang "It is Only a Tiny Garden," by Haydn Wood, very sweetly. She has a pleasing voice and looks pretty.

Sandwiched into the show in a careless manner, seemingly, but for that very carelessness, effective, was an old folk-song, "In the Gloaming." The Rialto Chorus sang this number inconspicuously seated about the fringe of the orchestra. It is a song loved by everybody and was sung well. The lighting effects were especially good; distinctly a la Rothapfel.

Mr. Rothapfel is gradually drawing away from the big operatic arias and getting closer to the hearts of the people by the introduction of the beautiful old songs. It is especially appropriate at this time of war and clamor that a few of those simple, yet kindly, melodies should soothe the bleeding hearts about us. They are typically American and breathe patriotism in their very simplicity. We must have entertainment; the quieter the better.

The musical setting to the feature was a bit disappointing. Vivian Martin in "Unclaimed Goods" was as dainty as ever, while the story was good. Numbers of Western scenes and beautiful landscapes created great opportunities for music; not big stuff, but melodious and dainty melodies. There were too many one-steps played to suit us. The agitators were too long, and the Indian number used to indicate the atmosphere of a Western mining town, was out of place. We expected to see Indians, but only heard their music. By the greatest stretch of the imagination we could not think Mr. Rothapfel fitted this picture. The theme "Dearie" was most appropriate, and the scenes selected for its use could not be improved upon, but why does such a magnificent body of musicians continue to play cheap "hurrys"? Let the little fellow play them. They meet his requirements and can be easily played, but from the Rialto Symphony Orchestra we expected something better.

Musical Suggestion Synopsis.

BIGGEST SHOW ON EARTH, THE (Paramount—Five reels)—Theme—Moderato. Suggest "Circus Day in Dixie" or "At the Hamiet"—Godard.

This is distinctly circus atmosphere, and would suggest using "A Day with the Circus"—Lampe, and "County Fair"—Armand. Lots of work for the drummer to get lion roars, cracking of whip, etc. Many marches, two-steps and fox-trots are needed. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paramount exchange.

CONQUERED HEARTS (Ivan Film Co.—Eight reels)—Theme—Andante. Suggest "A Little Song"—Erdody, "Last Dream of the Virgin"—Massenet, or "Even Song"—Martin.

Open with "Old Timers" by Lake, as it fits the situation as no other piece will. Dramatic music is needed throughout. Note the direct cue for "There's a Long, Long Trail," by Elliott. Catch the Egyptian Dance and use Ballet Egyptian No. 2, by Luigini. A couple of marches and two-steps are needed. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Ivan exchange.

HAND AT THE WINDOW, THE (Triangle—Five reels)—Theme for the Hero—Andante. Suggest "Nina"—Tanara, or "A Night in Venice"—Tanara.

The story holds Italian atmosphere, but takes place in America. Use as many folk songs as possible, such as "Marguerite," "Amuri Amuri" and "O Sole Mio." Dramatic pieces will find a place, but hurrys are not needed. Note the direct cue for "Home, Sweet Home," in the last reel. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Triangle exchange.

HOOPS OF STEEL (Paralta—Six reels)—Theme—Andante. Suggest "Melody D'Amour"—Hurst, "Claire de Lune"—Thome, or "Extase"—Ganne.

The atmosphere is Western throughout and the story dramatic. A couple of Spanish numbers can be used in the scenes of the Spanish half-breed woman. "Hansel Und Gretel," by Humperdinck, will suit the children's scene. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paralta exchange.

LOVE-BROKERS, THE (Triangle—Five reels)—Theme—Andante. Suggest "Love Song"—Flegier, "Dream of the Flowers"—Cohen, or "Elysium"—Speaks.

This is a society drama and needs big stuff; no hurry required. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Triangle exchange.

MASKS AND FACES (World—Six reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Gavotte. Suggest "Frills and Furbelows"—Crespi.

The atmosphere is old English and would suggest the use of "Songs from Shakespeare's Time"—Borch and "Sounds from England"—Langey, "The Wind that Shakes the Barley." Note the violin solo bits throughout this picture. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Triangle Exchange.

MRS. SLACKER (Pathe—Five reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Andante. Suggest "Roma"—Edwards, "Rosemary"—Elgar, or "Serenade"—Tittl.

The picture is dramatic, with a patriotic touch. Use "Over There" in the second reel and open the fifth reel with a pathetic. Note the storm effects, but don't overdo them. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Pathe Exchange.

PRIMITIVE WOMAN, THE (Triangle—Five reels).—No theme necessary.

Many pastorales are needed for this outdoor picture. Light serenades and waltz intermezzos will be most appropriate as fill-ins. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Triangle Exchange.

SOCIETY FOR SALE (Triangle—Five reels).—Theme—Andante. Suggest "By the River"—Morse, "Bagatelle"—Heimendahl, or "Daffodils"—Carvel.

The atmosphere is English, and old English airs can be used nicely. The picture is light society comedy. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Triangle Exchange.

THE LAW OF THE GREAT NORTHWEST (Triangle—Five reels).—Theme—Andante Sostenuto. Suggest "Romance from King Manfred"—Reinecke, "Reverie"—Rissland, or "Twilight"—Cesek.

This is a story about the Northwest, rich in Indian atmosphere. It would be well to play an Indian characteristic as a second theme for Monast. Note the fight in the third reel, requiring a short agitato, and the fight in the last for the same length. Much pastoral music is needed, and would suggest:

"Whispering Flowers"—Intermezzo—Blon.

"Canzonetta"—Moderato—Nicode.

"Forest Whispers"—Gavotte—Losey.

"Rustles of Spring"—Allegro—Sinding.

Cue sheets can be obtained from the Triangle Exchange.

TYRANT FEAR (Paramount—Five reels).—Theme—Andante. Suggest "On the Banks of the Saskatchewan"—Caryll, or "Meditation"—Williams.

This is a Canadian story, and by using "Carillon March"—Laurendeau—you will establish the character at screening. Furioso in first reel, dramatic tension and fox-trot in second, dramatic tension in the third, and agitato in fourth. Note church chimes in first and fourth reel. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paramount Exchange.

WHITE MAN'S LAW, THE (Paramount—Five reels).—Theme—Andante and Oriental. Suggest "Arabian Serenade"—Langey, "Serenata"—Tarengi, or "Moresque"—Lack.

The atmosphere is East Indian and needs Oriental setting. This picture is dramatic and requires big stuff. Haendel's Largo will fit nicely just before the close of the picture. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paramount Exchange.

WHO KILLED WALTON (Triangle—Five reels).—Theme—Andagio. Suggest "Prelude"—Chopin, "Rhapsodie"—Stieger, or "Where Blooms the Rose."—Johns.

A light drama with the following twists—Restaurant scene in second reel requiring Valse Lento; cabaret scene in third reel requiring rag music. Shortly after a Spanish intermezzo is needed and a popular two-step in the last reel. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Triangle Exchange.

UNCLAIMED GOODS (Paramount—Five reels).—Theme for the Heroine—Andante. Suggest "Dearie," "Sweet Ponderings"—Langey, or "Twilight"—Ayer.

There is a western atmosphere to this picture, but no Indian music is needed. The story is light and pretty. Choose dainty stuff except for the fight scenes in the fourth and fifth reels. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paramount Exchange.

Leaders Service Bureau.

Questions Answered—Suggestions Offered.

Q.—"I am an exhibitor and try to put my show over with good music. My leader repeats continually, and tells me as his excuse that he plays just what the cue sheet calls for. How can I get relief?"

A.—"Investigate his library and ascertain whether he has it properly classified for quick action. It looks to us as if it was not so much a matter of cue sheets as laziness."

Q.—"How can I procure a good organist capable of playing the pictures properly?"

A.—"Tell us how much you can pay and we can supply one. The Wurlitzer Organ Company of New York or J. P. Seeburg Piano Company of Chicago always have capable men ready to go to work."

Q.—"I noticed your classification of instruments in a recent issue of The Moving Picture World, such as 'strings,' 'wood-wind,' etc. To what section does piano belong?"

A.—"The piano is not originally an orchestral instrument, but in view of the fact that the harp is placed in the 'string' section and the piano usually does the same work in a smaller combination, we suppose it should be classified under the same head."

Q.—"What is the difference between snare and kettle drum?"

A.—"Snare drums are side drums, across the lower head of which are stretched several gut strings—the 'snares'—whose jarring against the head reinforces the tone; while kettle drums consist of a hollow brass or copper hemisphere (the kettle) resting on a tripod, with a head of vellum stretched by means of an iron ring and tightened by a set of screws. These are usually known as timpani."

Q.—"Are the musicians in symphony orchestras placed to conform with any set rule, or are the various sections so arranged at the conductor's pleasure? Are house acoustics taken into consideration?"

A.—"House acoustics are not taken into consideration. The usual form of the placing of players in a symphony orchestra is as follows: on the left of the conductor are the first violins, backed up by the bassi and harp; in front are the 'cello, backed by the wood-wind; while on the right are the second violins and violas, backed by the brass, and beyond are the drums and timpani. Sometimes the double basses are placed far back in the front, especially if it is a large orchestra, and once in a while you will find the harp on the extreme right if the drums are also in the front at the rear."

Q.—"Who wrote Pershing's March and where can it be purchased?"

A.—"Pershing's March was written by A. S. Watt, and is published by the Astoria Publishing Company, 505 Fifth avenue, New York City."

Q.—"Has the Paramount discontinued scores for their special productions? Is one available for 'The Blue Bird'?"

A.—"Paramount has discontinued scores for all their productions owing to the lack of support given by the exhibitor. It was announced that James R. Bradford was to write and arrange special orchestral score for 'Blue Bird,' but for some reason the promise was not fulfilled."

Q.—"In combination of piano, violin and 'cello, should the pianist keep strictly to piano part or 'cue-in' other parts when possible so as to make the orchestra sound fuller?"

A.—"By all means have the pianist play all of the cued parts which are not handled by the other instruments."

Q.—"Many times my patrons complain that they hear the same music repeated so often. I am not a musician and would not know if my leader were guilty of the offense. What can I do?"

A.—"There are two ways to handle the situation. Get a musical friend to sit in at each change of show and note the repetition, or arrange with your leader to give you a list of his selections each week. They can readily be checked up."

Q.—"We have an organ of the _____ brand in our theater. The pipes are situated on either side of the auditorium and those seated near them get the full benefit of the noise without music. In the back or in the centre it sounds all right. What is the reason for this?"

A.—"The acoustic properties of your house were evidently overlooked in the misplacing of your organ. Nothing can be done unless you change the pipes. Behind or around the proscenium arch is generally regarded as the proper place for them."

Q.—"Because of additional numbers, recently bought, my library must be re-classified to be of value. Give me an idea of the best system to adopt."

A.—"List your music under characteristic heads, number each piece, beginning with No. 1 in each set, then catalogue them alphabetically, according to (1) movement, (2) character and (3) composer."

"See our article upon 'Classification of Your Library,' in the March 9th issue of the Moving Picture World, page 1373. You can procure this number by sending us 19 cents, if you are unable to get it from the files of your employer."

Hadley Completing a Cinema-Symphony

Photodrama Will Be Accompanied by Music That Will Tell a Story Identical With That on Screen.

COMBINING equally for the first time the highly developed descriptive power of music with the newer art of story telling by pictures, Hopp Hadley is completing the first symphony for motion pictures or, as he calls it, a Cinema-Symphony.

The new idea picture is in five reels, and is, when seen upon the screen without the music, similar to any high-class photodrama with novel artistic photographic effects. When seen with the orchestra playing the symphony, however, the photographic effects take on a special significance, as they tell in pictures the part of the story which only a lover of music would be able to follow in the orchestration. Also the action of the story and the strains of music are found to bear a closer relation than in the ordinary picture with a regulation orchestra accompaniment.

Mr. Hadley, who has been closely identified with the theatrical and motion picture business for many years, having been a theatrical manager before entering the motion picture business as scenario editor of the Majestic and Reliance Companies in the old studio on West Twenty-first street when single reels were features, has always taken a keen interest in the development of a closer relation between pictures and music, as he has been a violinist of more than ordinary ability since childhood.

He gives Strauss' Symphonia Domestica (Domestic Symphony) the credit for keeping his thoughts on the subject until Cinema-Symphony took form in his mind and also for convincing him that, once correctly worked out, its popularity with both lovers of pictures and music would be assured. He reasons that picture audiences will be more deeply stirred by the drama without realizing why, while music lovers will get the full benefit of the double entertainment.

Strauss' domestic symphony tells a complete story in music: Three characters are introduced; the father, the mother and the child, and it is said the action may be followed as easily as if it were told in words or given in pantomime.

For the first Cinema-Symphony, Hopp Hadley saw the necessity of finding a subject especially well adapted to the idea. It came to his hand unexpectedly two months ago and he has been working on it ever since with the result that he hopes to announce its definite release in a few days. He claims that the story is on a par with that of any feature production and that it is made stronger by the fact that the original music which accompanies it and which the story in turn illustrates, is given equal prominence with the drama; each dominating in turn—the nature of the action determining when the burden of stirring the emotions shall fall most heavily upon the music and when the music shall act only as a support.

Reasoning that the importance of music in the presenting of photodramas is now generally recognized, many of the most successful theater managers having made their music a prominent feature of their programs with excellent box office results, Mr. Hadley thinks that the producers and distributors have not kept pace with the exhibitors in this respect and looks forward to the day when music will come into its own and be considered as necessary to pictures as the actors.

PICTURES FOR MAN-O'-WARSMEN AT SEA.

Through the efforts of the War Camp Motion Picture Committee the various ships of the navy on which there is motion picture equipment will be enabled to obtain supplies of recent pictures for their use while at sea. The Bureau of Navigation of the Navy Department has asked the committee for several hundred complete schedules of exchanges for distribution through the Navy Department, and they have been forwarded. Price lists with special rates for entertainments while the boats are in port are also being furnished, together with detailed information as to methods of securing motion picture programs to take to sea. The War Camp Committee has requested the Army and Navy Commissions on Training Camp Activities to furnish the Navy Department with the bulletin lists of pictures selected by the National Board of Review for the Commissions. This will make it practicable for the chaplains on board more than two hundred ships to visit the exchanges nearest the ports of landing of their vessels and obtain such pictures as they desire.

Rolfe Severs Active Connection with Metro

While Retaining Financial Interest in Company Will Make Eight Productions a Year—Florence Reed Engaged.

A STATEMENT from B. A. Rolfe says that he has severed his active connections with the Metro company, although retaining his financial interest, in order that he may devote his entire time to a producing company which he has recently formed and which he has been working on for some months past.

It is the plan of Mr. Rolfe's company to make about eight super-features a year featuring stars of known box-office value in really high-class productions which will not have to depend on the player's drawing power alone to receive a welcome. Mr. Rolfe will supervise all direction and production and says he already has under contract a number of authors and scenario writers.

The first name to be announced in the list of stars for the new company is that of Florence Reed. For her photoplays special material will be secured, the features given a high-class production in every way and will be as nearly perfect as money and brains can make them.

Mr. Rolfe states that announcements as to other stars and matters of interest will be forthcoming within the next week or two.

Great College to Teach Scenario Writing

Class Started at University of California Will Study Script-Building at Tivoli Opera House.

THE University of California has given official recognition to scenario writing as a profession and a class is now being enrolled at the San Francisco office of the University Extension Division, 62 Post street. The T. & D. Tivoli Opera House has been chosen as the classroom for the course, which will be commenced at an early date. Both morning and evening classes will be given and an opportunity will be presented to those having ideas for good moving pictures to learn how to place them in the form of salable manuscripts.

A course of fifteen lectures will be given by Earl Snell, formerly with the California Motion Picture Corporation, and more recently scenario writer for Beatriz Michelena. As soon as a working foundation is laid the study will be confined largely to an analysis of photoplay successes, which will be projected for the benefit of the class. In some instances the selected pictures will be supplemented by portions of the actual scenarios from which they were produced. Many prominent scenario writers have indorsed the course, among these being C. Gardner Sullivan, and the initial enrollment is very satisfactory.

FARNUM MAKES PICTURE FOR BOND CAMPAIGN.

One hundred and twenty prints of a smashing Liberty film in which William Farnum, Fox star, plays the principal role, have just been requested by William G. McAdoo, Secretary of the Treasury, for use in floating the Third Liberty Loan. For more than a month Farnum, his director, Frank Lloyd, and their company of picture players have been utilizing every spare moment at Hollywood, in the production of the film, which is said to be a striking argument for national support of the Liberty Loan in addition to being a highly interesting feature aside from its patriotic aspect.

Arrangements are being made for distribution of the copies through the twelve Federal Reserve state committees throughout the United States.

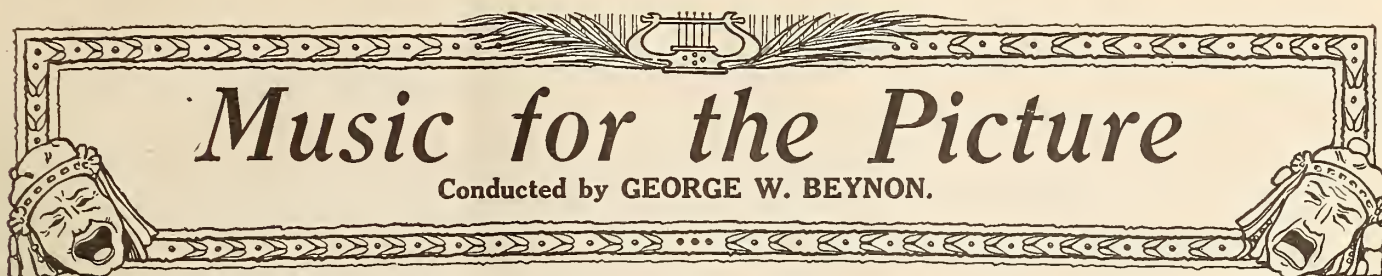

MARIE DORO FORMS HER OWN COMPANY.

Marie Doro has seen the advantage of a star having her own producing company and has just formed an organization for the purpose of turning out Marie Doro Feature Photoplays. The star will be seen in a series of pictures directed by a man who has had years of experience and written by some of the foremost authors who are preparing scenarios especially suited to the well-known talents of this stage and screen star.

Miss Doro will engage her supporting company, which will include a leading man favorably known and other players whose names are familiar to lovers of motion pictures. Negotiations are now under way with a newly-formed releasing organization.

GENERAL'S NEW YORK EXCHANGE MOVES.

General Film Company's New York sales office has moved from its downtown location to 729 Seventh avenue. The removal was begun April 20. These new quarters consist of the whole ninth floor.

Music for the Picture

Conducted by GEORGE W. BEYNON.

Notice.

QUESTIONS regarding music, addressed to this department, will receive a carbon copy of the department's reply by mail, when 4 cents are enclosed. Special replies by mail on matter which cannot be answered in this column $1.00.

Music of the Future.

IT IS hardly necessary to go back to the piano and drums period of picture presentation for comparison. Just as the picture industry has advanced step by step, so music has kept pace, providing a higher form of entertainment with each upward move. Its mission has been identical with that of better pictures: to draw a better class of patrons. In the infant days of photoplays the class that patronized the "movies" cared little for music, but appreciated the noise. The banging improvisations of a piano player, augmented by the cymbal-crashing drummer, delighted their ears and provided opportunity for loud chatter or louder guffaws.

The exhibitor noted the excellence of the "movie" novelty, saw its wonderful possibilities and wondered why the better class of his neighborhood stayed away. By special publicity he got them to come—once, but they would not return. He thought that the poor ventilation or rough interior of his storeroom were to blame and moved into better quarters. The desired clientele came again, but his new theater knew them no more. He cudgelled his brain for the reason. He felt that his pictures were good. His projection was exceptionally fine. The new home of the silent drama was the last word in "movie" theaters. His interior lighting and lobby lights were strictly up to date, yet there was something lacking somewhere.

He was not in the remotest sense a musician nor even a devotee of the art. He could not whistle a tune to save his bank roll for his vocation was business, not art. His music sounded all right to him and many of his regular patrons expressed themselves delightedly upon the subject. Therefore, although he had changed everything else of the old regime, his piano and drums still kept up the clattering accompaniment to his pictures.

One day he attended an exhibitors' convention in a large city and was surprised to learn that some theaters were spending as high as three hundred dollars a week for musicians. From his practical standpoint it looked like bad business, for he could not see where he could add anything to his overhead expenses and make a living. He admitted subconsciously that a larger body of men looked better, and the music seemed softer and sweeter, but the additional cost could not be compensated for by sweeter sound.

A few days later he was told by a film salesman that in a neighboring town a fellow exhibitor had installed a pipe organ at an expense of $15,000. With gaping mouth and bulging eyes he declared that exhibitors in general had gone crazy over music. He was also informed that the day of the five-cent picture house was gone and that the ruling charge for admission to those houses where the music had been improved was ten and fifteen cents.

Though slow to act he was a good gambler, and forthwith dispensed with his marathon pianist and frolicsome drummer. A five-piece orchestra took their place and his audience missed the noise, but liked the music. At first many of them fell asleep. The rumor went abroad that a "symphony" orchestra was the feature of his theater. The better class of people came again—and stayed. To-day he has another house, bigger, more up to date, changing pictures only twice a week and featuring an orchestra of eighteen pieces and a huge pipe organ played by a capable artist. His box office receipts prove the sound investment made in good music.

To-day we have probably a dozen theaters in America with orchestras of thirty men or more devoted to pictures. Hundreds of houses have large organs, and thousands small orchestral combinations. All this, in spite of the expense incidental to gathering together a good orchestra, the difficulty in procuring proper musical service from producers and the loss of seating capacity by staging the orchestra or placing the organ.

What does the future hold?

Judging from the rapid strides already made we fear to even guess just our prediction fall far short of the ultimate mark. A review of a few pertinent facts may give some inkling.

To-day every producer realizes the worth of a proper musical setting to his picture and to the best of his ability strives to meet the needs of the exhibitor. Many are providing cue-sheets, while some go to great expense in arranging orchestra scores. No longer is there any apathy shown in the executive offices of the big film magnates when the subject of music is broached. Their house organs are giving music wide publicity. Music service departments are becoming a large factor in the selling of pictures and what the other fellow is doing in this line is closely watched lest he forge ahead of them.

In the theaters the audience is more conversant with the dual art of pictures and music and continually demands a better musical performance. The exhibitor keeps in close touch with his orchestral leader. What was good enough a year ago is distinctly poor to-day. The work of fitting pictures has become more exacting in its detail than ever before. Frequent repetitions of a number are frowned on and woe betide the leader that in a moment of carelessness uses inappropriate music. It is nothing unusual to have people request the musician to give them the name of a particular selection played during a specified scene. This demonstrates the musical educational value of picture music.

In the field of composers, arrangers of scores, and compilers of cue-sheets, we find a well-marked advance of ideas. Those who stuck to the old lines are "falling out" and the gap is filled by more competent artists. Never before has there been such efforts along the line of research work for the arranger. Composers of recognized ability have entered the picture field and find therein wide opportunity for displaying their talent. New music is the continual cry of musicians playing to pictures and that demand must be satisfied only by selections of merit. Any "old thing" is no longer good enough. Music for the pictures must have atmosphere, and be of a form, practical for picture purposes. Shoddy stuff is rejected, but thematic treatment receives instant approbation.

Musical scores are receiving more and more consideration from the producers. The advantages derived from this form of musical accompaniment are manifold. The use of themes for the different characters arranged in varied forms has proved to be the highest form of setting, but has suffered somewhat at the hands of poor arrangers. This form is in its infancy stages and no doubt will be developed to Wagnerian proportions as time goes on. The fitting of features by the process of suiting the dominant emotional scenes is also good and has reached artistic heights. Flash-backs are no longer regarded musically unless their bearing on the plot is consequential.

We feel that the music of the future will be a score that combines both forms of treatment. Each scene will be fitted for its atmosphere, dominant feeling, and tempo, synchronized and properly key-blended, while interwoven will be found the themes significant of the characters in the foreground. Close attention will be paid to orchestral coloring, light and shade, depth and shallowness. Above all, variety will be the keynote of the entire composition. Orchestras everywhere will be enlarged, better organs and more capable organists will be used. The fifth largest industry will become the fourth and hold in its fold the greatest composers, musical directors and virtuoso players of the day.

Though great has been the progress of the silent drama, greater yet has been the advance in its music, and the future holds a promise so stupendous in its magnitude that picture music will rank favorably with grand opera and symphony.

American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers Gain Decision.

In a test case instituted by The St. Nicholas Avenue Amusement Co., asking that the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers be restrained from demanding from them or others similarly situated any license fee as a condition precedent to the playing of any of the musical compositions of the defendants, and from performing any act or acts whatsoever in concert which would prevent the playing by the plaintiff of any of the desired musical compositions of the defendant, Justice Goff denied the motion and gave the following opinion.

"After considering the argument of counsel and their briefs I am of the opinion that the defendant association is exercising only its lawful rights. It existed before the incorporation of the plaintiff and was engaged in the same general work before the plaintiff's existence. The association is formed for lawful purpose, and I find no exercise of any coercion. The institution of legal actions by individual members of the association for violation of copyright is justified for the protection of income from their music. Plaintiff wishes to use the product of the author's labor, ignoring copyright, free of any charge whatever, except the actual purchase price of the printed musical score. There is no restraint of trade through any act of the association. Plaintiff may use any music not the property of the members of the association without objection by the association. The only restraint on plaintiff is the possible right of the authors or owners of such music to prevent its use. The moving picture exhibitors have spent thousands of dollars advertising music which may be used by orchestras irrespective of the wishes of the defendant association or its individual members. The fact that the music of the authors who are members of the association is popular in demand presents just so much more reason why it should be protected and its unauthorized use at public entertainment given for profit, prevented. Practically the exhibitors of moving pictures seek to obtain by injunction the right to publicly perform copyrighted musical compositions for profit without a consent of the holder of copyright and without compensation to him."

Nobody wishes to deprive the author and composer of their royalties. The gift of giving music to the world cannot be estimated in dollars and cents, and no monetary consideration is adequate compensation for musical genius and inspiration. Heretofore, in America, the composers have been at the mercy of the publishers who by the very conditions instant to commercializing an art have been unable to adequately pay him. It is only fair that those who profit by the beautiful melodies, catchy airs, deeply thought and wisely wrought musical epics, should pay for them.

The objection comes in the manner of collecting the playing fee. There seems to be no well defined or set license fee for the playing of any particular number, but each theater must pay a lump sum, which permits the playing of any number from the catalog controlled by the Society of Authors and Composers. The musician is not charged any additional sum, but the owner of the theater must pay to allow his musicians to play selections by which they obtain their positions and through which they hold them. In other words, the theater manager must pay for music that belongs to the orchestral leader or organist and which goes with the latter when he leaves for pastures new. It would seem that the musician is really the one who profits by the use of the copyrighted numbers, so why charge the theater. There should be found some more equitable method of collecting the playing fee which rightly belongs to the composer.

Music for "The Unchastened Woman."

At the Morosco theater, Sunday, April 21, there was presented the Rialto de Luxe picture, "The Unchastened Woman," adapted and directed by Wm. Humphreys. It was an invitation affair and all the film magnates were present. The play from which the picture was evolved was a New York sensation, and like all the Morosco productions enjoyed a long run on Broadway. As evinced by the enthusiasm the picture evoked "The Unchastened Woman" will continue in popularity and grow in the hearts of the picture fans everywhere.

Preceded by the Overture "Il Guarany," by Gomez, the picture was ushered in by the strains of that well known melody, "Serenade," by Schubert. This number was used as the theme of the drama and fitted Miss Valentine's good acting. During the scene showing a drawing room where a few select friends were gathered to listen to a big singer the strains of "Pagliacci" were heard most appropriately. When we were carried to Switzerland the changed atmosphere was carried out in the music and we heard the reminiscences of Alpine yodeling.

The little touches of Auld Lang Syne and Home, Sweet Home, touched the heart with their kindness and brought out the true simplicity of the home life shown. Besides they provided a distinct contrast to such numbers used, like "Unfinished Symphony," by Schubert, the "Prelude" to King Manfred, and the "Pilgrim's Song," by Tschaiakowsky.

Synchrony is not possible in a musical setting, yet the breaks were hardly noticeable because of the careful conducting of Mr. Beynon. One thing stood out most noticeably during the presentation of the picture. At no time did the music predominate. The entire accompaniment was played almost pianissimo. As there are no big fight scenes or battle situations this was possible and its soothing effect was only excelled by its good taste.

Producers Deeply Interested in Music.

A recent issue of the Progress-Advance, the house organ of Paramount, tore down all precedent and prejudice and gleefully announced itself as a music number. Musical articles appeared from various capable musicians treating the different phases of picture playing. Nothing has pleased us so well since our last raise in salary.

Truly, music is coming to its own. And why not? What would pictures be without music? Why spend thousands of dollars to entertain people in silence when good music so enhances the presentation of the picture? This recognition of music as a big factor in picture selling is but a forerunner, and as its importance permeates the industry greater stress will be laid on proper musical service to the exhibitor. Music is a limitless art and affords an opportunity for sound selling arguments that cannot be estimated till tried.

Musical Suggestion Synopsis.

- BLINDNESS OF DIVORCE (Fox—Six Reels)—Theme not necessary. Note the wedding march in the first reel, followed by slow music of the heavier type. We need the wedding march again in the third reel, along with a fox-trot, Oriental dance and agitato. The last three reels are very dramatic and call for big stuff. There are two court room scenes which could be fitted with the same music to associate the ideas. Cue-sheets can be obtained from the Fox exchange.
- BRIDE OF FEAR, THE (Fox—Five Reels)—Theme not necessary. This is a melodrama requiring agitados, hurrys and misteriosos. The first and second reels are intensely dramatic, the third can be fitted with light allegretto stuff, the fourth needs slower music with the exception of the chase, when an agitato will fit. The last wants agitados, misteriosos and dramatic tensions. Cue-sheets can be obtained from the Fox exchange.
- DANGER GAME, THE (Goldwyn—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Allegretto. Suggest "Sweet Jasmine"—Bendix, "Moonlight Dance"—Finck, or "Prelude"—Aletter.
- Serenades, caprices and light intermezzos fit this humorous melodrama. A few agitados and light hurrys are needed while a couple of semi-misteriosos will fit nicely into the burglary scenes. Catch the fight in the third reel. Cue-sheet can be obtained from the Goldwyn exchange.
- FACE IN THE DARK, THE (Goldwyn—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Andante. Suggest "Clair de Lune"—Thome, "Dialogue"—Helmund-Meyer, or "Pleading"—Wood.
- The picture opens brightly and a bit grotesquely. Note the sleigh ride and use "Petersburg Sleighride"—Ellenberg, if possible. Catch the piano solo in the fourth reel and the need of a misterioso a little further along. Close with the theme. Cue-sheets can be obtained from the Goldwyn exchange.

FLOOR BELOW, THE (Goldwyn—Six Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Andantino. Suggest "Heloise"—Langey, "Astarte"—Meldenberg, or "Melodie"—Lederer.

With but few moments, this picture can be treated lightly. Intermezzos, mazurkas, waltzes and gavottes will meet most of your requirements. There is a harmonica solo which can be imitated on the organ, if you are fortunate in having one; otherwise disregard it. Cue-sheets can be obtained from the Goldwyn exchange.

GIRL FROM BEYOND, THE (Vitagraph—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Andante. Suggest "Romance"—Grinfeld, "Souvenir"—Geehl, or "Romance"—Rubenstein.

There is a change from eastern to western atmosphere that should be sharply brought out in contrast, to be effective. Dramatic music is required with a touch of the pastorals. Cue-sheets can be obtained from the Vitagraph exchange.

HEART OF THE SUNSET (Goldwyn—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Andante. Suggest "Love Theme"—Lee, or "Extase"—Ganne.

This is a romantic melodrama filled with adventure and deeds of daring. You will require big stuff for this feature. The atmosphere is somewhat Mexican and the free use of Spanish numbers will add to the picture presentation. Catch shots in first and fourth reel. Cue-sheets can be obtained from the Goldwyn exchange.

LEAP TO FAME (World—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Valse Lento. Suggest "Adele Waltzes"—Finn, "Dodola"—Frey, or "Golden Hearted Daisies"—Williams.

A comedy drama, American atmosphere, and requiring light treatment orchestrally. Note Egyptian dance needed in the first reel. A few agitados and hurrys will also come in handy as the picture draws to its close. Cue-sheets can be obtained from the World exchange.

PURPLE LILY, THE (World—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Andante Sostenuto. Suggests "Arabian Nights"—Mildenberg, "On Wings of Love"—Bendix, or "Inspiration"—Edwards.

Bright stuff till the last reel, in which comes a direct cue for "Home, Sweet Home," to be played by violin only. Note shots and sleigh bells. Cue-sheets can be obtained from the World exchange.

RICH MAN, POOR MAN (Paramount—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Allegretto. Suggest "Rainbow Girl"—Hirsch, "Love in Arcady"—Wood, or "Serenade"—Pierne.

Nothing but bright stuff is needed for this vivacious picture. Cue-sheets can be obtained from the Paramount exchange.

RIDERS OF THE NIGHT (Metro—Five Reels)—Theme—Adagio. Suggest "The Broken Melody"—Van Biene, "The Stars are Calling"—Robert, or "Where Blooms the Rose"—Johns.

The entire picture is very dramatic and would ordinarily require many agitados, hurrys and furiosos. It would be better to use standard overtures that have length to them so that choppiness be avoided. Cue-sheets can be obtained from the Metro exchange.

WESTERN BLOOD (Fox—Five Reels)—Theme—Andante. Suggest "Reverie"—Vieuxtemp, "Dawn of Hope"—Cassella, or "Elysium"—Speaks.

Another of those woolly western stories. Bright stuff with a Mexican flavor is what you need. Many fox-trots and agitados are required. Note the Virginia reel needed in the fourth part when they begin to dance. Cue-sheets can be obtained from the Fox exchange.

WITH NEATNESS AND DESPATCH (Metro—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Moderato. Suggest "Delicia"—Frantzen, "Serenade"—Widor, or "Romance"—Merricanto.

This is a comedy drama and should receive light treatment in the main. Note the piano solo to action and the agitados and misteriosos needed in the last reel. Cue-sheets can be obtained from the Metro exchange.

UNCHASTENED WOMAN, THE (Rialto de Luxe—Eight Reels)—See review in another column of this department.

Leaders Service Bureau.

Questions Answered. Suggestions Offered.

Q. "Why should my leader persist in alternating his playing with the piano? First he plays a number, then the pianist plays a number and they keep this up throughout the show. Why?"

A. "There seems to be no reason that we can see unless it is his desire to assure himself that he only works half as hard as the pianist. Music of that kind will kill your business. Better make a change in your orchestra pit."

Q. "While attending a picture house in New York City where they were playing 'The Girl Beyond' I was surprised to hear the orchestra start the 'Selections from the Mikado' by Sullivan. My disappointment was when I found no trace of Japanese atmosphere in the picture. Your articles continually harp on atmospherical fittings. Why don't you do it in New York?"

A. "One 'black eye' for New York. It is too bad you attended a theater which is so far behind the times, to get your impression of New York movies. No doubt this house caters to a portion of the submerged tenth who have no likes or dislikes in the matter of music. The next time you are in New York attend some other theater and tell us what your impressions are."

The Organ a Mighty Factor in Presenting Pictures.

IN a recent issue we discussed the relative merits of the organ and orchestra for the express purpose of helping the exhibitor select a proper medium for his musical presentation, cautioning him regarding the placing of the organ, guiding him in his choice of organist and calling to his attention possible weak points in organ playing.

In an earlier issue we treated the orchestra to a close analytical inspection showing its possible flaws, also.

We desire to clearly state our position regarding both mediums of picture expression. Played together, by competent musicians, they become the highest form of picture presentation. Nothing can fill out the orchestra like an organ, neither can we find another instrument with such solo possibilities. The organ, well played, has a distinct advantage over the orchestra because of its smoothness in changing tempo and selections. No abrupt nor harsh changes of key are felt. No instrument has its varied color nor can an orchestra hope to show such swift changes of color.

We thoroughly believe in the organ, and exhibitors must not misconstrue our attitude. No disparagement of this noble instrument is meant when offering suggestions as to its use. When we use the velvet covered hammer upon some of the big orchestras, there is no sneer in the swing, but a desire for better musical results.

Be not misled. The organ is a mighty factor in the presentation of pictures. Our aim is better music for you and whatever medium you use (organ or orchestra), do it justice by procuring the best musicians available.

Light and Music.

Many exhibitors throughout the country possess beautiful theaters with the latest electrical devices. They have a perfect switch-board back stage, footlights, "spots" and "colors." They are careful to properly diffuse the light from the dome and side lamps. The exit signs receive much attention with a view to preventing a conflux of refractory rays with good projection. Orchestra lights are not allowed to affect the screen and thought is given to the screen border lest it impair the projection lighting. Still there are exhibitors who do not take advantage of these facilities in enhancing their orchestral overture.

Music's first cousin is color, and light holds inherent within it many colors. Light is seen, sound is heard, and a linking of these powerful elements brings deeper comprehension. There is no conflict of action in a simultaneous use of the eye and ear. Proper lighting is interpretative to a remarkable degree and acts instantly upon our emotions. Greater interest is created in music if accompanied by varied lighting effects, synchronized to the changes of musical moods.

Imagination is strong within us, and everyone likes to visualize a scene musically described. Each will have a different mental picture so far as the details are concerned, and it is impossible to accurately portray those details, yet a suggestion of the dominant idea is quite practical. Back drops of atmospheric designs add greatly to the general tone of the music, and if clouds, stars, etc., are projected thereon, the scene becomes very realistic. By the further use of side projectors blue and red colors can be judiciously blended for specific effects, pleasing to the eye.

The overture, "Roumanian Poem," was recently given in the Strand of New York, using as a background a drop showing a placid lake, encircled with foliage. With the stage lights up the orchestra began the number. Slowly the lights faded, twilight came and blended into night. The moon rose from behind the foliage, clouds gathered, effacing the moon, and the storm began. Back-stage traps portrayed the thunder and rain while a side projector flashed lightning upon a dark stage. As the music rose higher, the flashing became more frequent and brighter; the thunder roared louder and the rain fell more heavily. As the music died down the thunder became more faint and gradually the storm ceased. The stage lights came up and later the entire theater was flooded with brightness typical of the sunlight again.

In the presenting of the "Blue Bird" at the Rivoli, Mr. Rothapfel opened with a drop made to take the form of a huge and barren mountain of untold height. It was a sombre drab gradually turning to blue. As the orchestra worked into a lighter vein, the sun slowly crept over the mountain top, diffusing a red glow. The screen descending brought that red down with it, which meant much to the thought behind it.

Happiness frequently is brought down to our plane if our hearts are ready to receive it.

Another theater used the screen as an additional aid to put over "William Tell" Overture. With house lights full and stage lights up the andante movement opened the overture. Gradually the dimmer brought the lights down as the movement progressed until the entire theater was in utter darkness when the orchestra reached the allegro. Then the storm began, intermittently at first, but increasing in force. Lightning flashed and thunder rolled. At this instant, a picture showing a dilapidated homestead being deluged with rain was projected upon the screen.

This made a pretty effect and concentrated the attention of the audience. As the storm died down the rain slowly diminished in the picture, the sun came out, and while the orchestra proceeded into the andante, we saw the sheep coming over the horizon. The scene was held until the finish of the movement, which brought the sheep and shepherd into a close-up, and faded out.

Immediately the allegro vivace was picked up by the orchestra. The lights slowly came up, and as the overture ended in a grand finale the theater was flooded with light. It provided real entertainment of a high-class order.

Nothing can be overlooked in the proper presentation of pictures, nor can one afford to merely depend upon the overture in its natural and usual form to win pleased patrons. Special lighting effects are comparatively inexpensive in operation and are within the reach of even the small exhibitor. The theater is a place of entertainment, primarily, and must keep pace in every department with the upward march of progress. Patrons look for novelties, and when you can give it to them in the form of an enhanced performance, thoughtfully prepared and brilliantly carried out, it is suicidal to overlook your opportunity.

Music at the Rialto.

Some shows are spectacular, some are grandiloquent, others are beautiful, but the performance given at the Rialto theater during the week commencing April 14 was decidedly PRETTY.

The overture, selections from Giaconda, was played as if every note meant something, and the usual excellent conducting of Hugo Reisenfeld accounted for it. The Rialto Chorus joined in the finale, and though adding little to the volume of sound, made a very pretty picture in their operatic costumes. This number was well received by the audience.

"The Clang of the Forge," rendered by Greek Evans, dressed as a blacksmith, was well staged, having the assistance of the Rialto Male Chorus and wonderful lighting effects. The first performance of this number showed need of a rehearsal in the ensemble singing and took away a degree of credit that should have gone to Mr. Evans. He possesses a wide range and pleases his listeners immensely. His stage presence is especially good.

Gloria Gale sang "It is Only a Tiny Garden," by Haydn Wood, very sweetly. She has a pleasing voice and looks pretty.

Sandwiched into the show in a careless manner, seemingly, but for that very carelessness, effective, was an old folk-song, "In the Gloaming." The Rialto Chorus sang this number inconspicuously seated about the fringe of the orchestra. It is a song loved by everybody and was sung well. The lighting effects were especially good; distinctly a la Rothapfel.

Mr. Rothapfel is gradually drawing away from the big operatic arias and getting closer to the hearts of the people by the introduction of the beautiful old songs. It is especially appropriate at this time of war and clamor that a few of those simple, yet kindly, melodies should soothe the bleeding hearts about us. They are typically American and breathe patriotism in their very simplicity. We must have entertainment; the quieter the better.

The musical setting to the feature was a bit disappointing. Vivian Martin in "Unclaimed Goods" was as dainty as ever, while the story was good. Numbers of Western scenes and beautiful landscapes created great opportunities for music; not big stuff, but melodious and dainty melodies. There were too many one-steps played to suit us. The agitatos were too long, and the Indian number used to indicate the atmosphere of a Western mining town, was out of place. We expected to see Indians, but only heard their music. By the greatest stretch of the imagination we could not think Mr. Rothapfel fitted this picture. The theme "Dearie" was most appropriate, and the scenes selected for its use could not be improved upon, but why does such a magnificent body of musicians continue to play cheap "hurrys"? Let the little fellow play them. They meet his requirements and can be easily played, but from the Rialto Symphony Orchestra we expected something better.

Musical Suggestion Synopsis.

BIGGEST SHOW ON EARTH, THE (Paramount—Five reels)—Theme—Moderato. Suggest "Circus Day in Dixie" or "At the Hamlet"—Godard.

This is distinctly circus atmosphere, and would suggest using "A Day with the Circus"—Lampe, and "County Fair"—Armand. Lots of work for the drummer to get lion roars, cracking of whip, etc. Many marches, two-steps and fox-trots are needed. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paramount exchange.

CONQUERED HEARTS (Ivan Film Co.—Eight reels)—Theme—Andante. Suggest "A Little Song"—Erdody, "Last Dream of the Virgin"—Massenet, or "Even Song"—Martin.

Open with "Old Timers" by Lake, as it fits the situation as no other piece will. Dramatic music is needed throughout. Note the direct cue for "There's a Long, Long Trail," by Elliott. Catch the Egyptian Dance and use Ballet Egyptian No. 2, by Luigini. A couple of marches and two-steps are needed. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Ivan exchange.

HAND AT THE WINDOW, THE (Triangle—Five reels)—Theme for the Hero—Andante. Suggest "Nina"—Tanara, or "A Night in Venice"—Tanara.

The story holds Italian atmosphere, but takes place in America. Use as many folk songs as possible, such as "Marguerite," "Amuri Amuri" and "O Sole Mio." Dramatic pieces will find a place, but hurrys are not needed. Note the direct cue for "Home, Sweet Home," in the last reel. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Triangle exchange.

HOOPS OF STEEL (Paralta—Six reels)—Theme—Andante. Suggest "Melody D'Amour"—Hurst, "Claire de Lune"—Thome, or "Extase"—Ganne.

The atmosphere is Western throughout and the story dramatic. A couple of Spanish numbers can be used in the scenes of the Spanish half-breed woman. "Hansel Und Gretel," by Humperdinck, will suit the children's scene. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paralta exchange.

LOVE-BROKERS, THE (Triangle—Five reels)—Theme—Andante. Suggest "Love Song"—Flegier, "Dream of the Flowers"—Cohen, or "Elysium"—Speaks.

This is a society drama and needs big stuff; no hurry required. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Triangle exchange.

MASKS AND FACES (World—Six reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Gavotte. Suggest "Frills and Furbelows"—Crespi.

The atmosphere is old English and would suggest the use of "Songs from Shakespeare's Time"—Borch and "Sounds from England"—Langey, "The Wind that Shakes the Barley." Note the violin solo bits throughout this picture. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Triangle Exchange.

MRS. SLACKER (Pathe—Five reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Andante. Suggest "Roma"—Edwards, "Rosemary"—Elgar, or "Serenade"—Titt'l.

The picture is dramatic, with a patriotic touch. Use "Over There" in the second reel and open the fifth reel with a pathetic. Note the storm effects, but don't overdo them. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Pathe Exchange.

PRIMITIVE WOMAN, THE (Triangle—Five reels)—No theme necessary.

Many pastorales are needed for this outdoor picture. Light serenades and waltz intermezzos will be most appropriate as fill-ins. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Triangle Exchange.

SOCIETY FOR SALE (Triangle—Five reels)—Theme—Andante. Suggest "By the River"—Morse, "Bagatelle"—Heimendahl, or "Daffodils"—Carvel.

The atmosphere is English, and old English airs can be used nicely. The picture is light society comedy. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Triangle Exchange.

THE LAW OF THE GREAT NORTHWEST (Triangle—Five reels)—Theme—Andante Sostenuto. Suggest "Romance from King Manfred"—Reinecke, "Reverie"—Rissland, or "Twilight"—Cesek.

This is a story about the Northwest, rich in Indian atmosphere. It would be well to play an Indian characteristic as a second theme for Monast. Note the fight in the third reel, requiring a short agitato, and the fight in the last for the same length. Much pastoroale music is needed, and would suggest:

"Whispering Flowers"—Intermezzo—Blon.
 "Canzonetta"—Moderato—Nicode.
 "Forest Whispers"—Gavotte—Loscy.
 "Rustles of Spring"—Allegro—Sinding.

Cue sheets can be obtained from the Triangle Exchange.

TYRANT FEAR (Paramount—Five reels)—Theme—Andante. Suggest "On the Banks of the Saskatchewan"—Caryl, or "Meditation"—Williams.

This is a Canadian story, and by using "Carillon March"—Laurendeau—you will establish the character at screening. Furioso in first reel, dramatic tension and fox-trot in second, dramatic tension in the third, and agitato in fourth. Note church chimes in first and fourth reel. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paramount Exchange.

WHITE MAN'S LAW, THE (Paramount—Five reels)—Theme—Andante and Oriental. Suggest "Arabian Serenade"—Langey, "Seruata"—Tarengli, or "Moresque"—Lack.

The atmosphere is East Indian and needs Oriental setting. This picture is dramatic and requires big stuff. Haendel's Largo will fit nicely just before the close of the picture. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paramount Exchange.

WHO KILLED WALTON (Triangle—Five reels)—Theme—Andaglo. Suggest "Prelude"—Chopin, "Rhapsodio"—Stieger, or "Where Blooms the Rose"—Johns.

A light drama with the following twists—Restaurant scene in second reel requiring Valse Lento; cabaret scene in third reel requiring rag music. Shortly after a Spanish intermezzo is needed and a popular two-step in the last reel. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Triangle Exchange.

UNCLAIMED GOODS (Paramount—Five reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Andante. Suggest "Dearie," "Sweet Ponderings"—Langey, or "Twilight"—Ayer.

There is a western atmosphere to this picture, but no Indian music is needed. The story is light and pretty. Choose dainty stuff except for the fight scenes in the fourth and fifth reels. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paramount Exchange.

Leaders Service Bureau.

Questions Answered—Suggestions Offered.

Q.—"I am an exhibitor and try to put my show over with good music. My leader repeats continually, and tells me as his excuse that he plays just what the cue sheet calls for. How can I get relief?"

A.—"Investigate his library and ascertain whether he has it properly classified for quick action. It looks to us as if it was not so much a matter of cue sheets as laziness."

Q.—"How can I procure a good organist capable of playing the pictures properly?"

A.—"Tell us how much you can pay and we can supply one. The Wurlitzer Organ Company of New York or J. P. Seeburg Piano Company of Chicago always have capable men ready to go to work."

Q.—"I noticed your classification of instruments in a recent issue of The Moving Picture World, such as 'strings,' 'wood-wind,' etc. To what section does piano belong?"

A.—"The piano is not originally an orchestral instrument, but in view of the fact that the harp is placed in the 'string' section and the piano usually does the same work in a smaller combination, we suppose it should be classified under the same head."

Q.—"What is the difference between snare and kettle drum?"

A.—"Snare drums are side drums, across the lower head of which are stretched several gut strings—the 'snares'—whose jarring against the head reinforces the tone; while kettle drums consist of a hollow brass or copper hemisphere (the kettle) resting on a tripod, with a head of vellum stretched by means of an iron riug and tightened by a set of screws. These are usually known as timpani."

Q.—"Are the musicians in symphony orchestras placed to conform with any set rule, or are the various sections so arranged at the conductor's pleasure? Are house acoustics taken into consideration?"

A.—"House acoustics are not taken into consideration. The usual form of the placing of players in a symphony orchestra is as follows: on the left of the conductor are the first violins, backed up by the bassi and harp; in front are the 'cello, backed by the wood-wind; while on the right are the second violins and violas, backed by the brass, and beyond are the drums and timpani. Sometimes the double basses are placed far back in the front, especially if it is a large orchestra, and once in a while you will find the harp on the extreme right if the drums are also in the front at the rear."

Q.—"Who wrote Pershing's March and where can it be purchased?"

A.—"Pershing's March was written by A. S. Watt, and is published by the Astoria Publishing Company, 505 Fifth avenue, New York City."

Q.—"Has the Paramount discontinued scores for their special productions? Is one available for 'The Blue Bird'?"

A.—"Paramount has discontinued scores for all their productions owing to the lack of support given by the exhibitor. It was announced that James R. Bradford was to write and arrange special orchestral score for 'Blue Bird,' but for some reason the promise was not fulfilled."

A.—"By all means have the pianist play all of the cued parts which are not handled by the other instruments."

Q.—"Many times my patrons complain that they hear the same music repeated so often. I am not a musician and would not know if my leader were guilty of the offense. What can I do?"

A.—"There are two ways to handle the situation. Get a musical friend to sit in at each change of show and note the repetition, or arrange with your leader to give you a list of his selections each week. They can readily be checked up."

Q.—"We have an organ of the _____ brand in our theater. The pipes are situated on either side of the auditorium and those seated near them get the full benefit of the noise without music. In the back or in the centre it sounds all right. What is the reason for this?"

A.—"The acoustic properties of your house were evidently overlooked in the misplacing of your organ. Nothing can be done unless you change the pipes. Behind or around the proscenium arch is generally regarded as the proper place for them."

Q.—"Because of additional numbers, recently bought, my library must be re-classified to be of value. Give me an idea of the best system to adopt."

A.—"List your music under characteristic heads, number each piece, beginning with No. 1 in each set, then catalogue them alphabetically, according to (1) movement, (2) character and (3) composer."

"See our article upon 'Classification of Your Library,' in the March 9th issue of The Moving Picture World, page 1373. You can procure this number by sending us 19 cents, if you are unable to get it from the files of your employer."

Hadley Completing a Cinema-Symphony

Photodrama Will Be Accompanied by Music That Will Tell a Story Identical With That on Screen.

COMBINING equally for the first time the highly developed descriptive power of music with the newer art of story telling by pictures, Hopp Hadley is completing the first symphony for motion pictures or, as he calls it, a Cinema-Symphony.

The new idea picture is in five reels, and is, when seen upon the screen without the music, similar to any high-class photodrama with novel artistic photographic effects. When seen with the orchestra playing the symphony, however, the photographic effects take on a special significance, as they tell in pictures the part of the story which only a lover of music would be able to follow in the orchestration. Also the action of the story and the strains of music are found to bear a closer relation than in the ordinary picture with a regulation orchestra accompaniment.

Mr. Hadley, who has been closely identified with the theatrical and motion picture business for many years, having been a theatrical manager before entering the motion picture business as scenario editor of the Majestic and Reliance Companies in the old studio on West Twenty-first street when single reels were features, has always taken a keen interest in the development of a closer relation between pictures and music, as he has been a violinist of more than ordinary ability since childhood.

He gives Strauss' Symphonia Domestica (Domestic Symphony) the credit for keeping his thoughts on the subject until Cinema-Symphony took form in his mind and also for convincing him that, once correctly worked out, its popularity with both lovers of pictures and music would be assured. He reasons that picture audiences will be more deeply stirred by the drama without realizing why, while music lovers will get the full benefit of the double entertainment.

Strauss' domestic symphony tells a complete story in music: Three characters are introduced; the father, the mother and the child, and it is said the action may be followed as easily as if it were told in words or given in pantomime.

For the first Cinema-Symphony, Hopp Hadley saw the necessity of finding a subject especially well adapted to the idea. It came to his hand unexpectedly two months ago and he has been working on it ever since with the result that he hopes to announce its definite release in a few days. He claims that the story is on a par with that of any feature production and that it is made stronger by the fact that the original music which accompanies it and which the story in turn illustrates, is given equal prominence with the drama; each dominating in turn—the nature of the action determining when the burden of stirring the emotions shall fall most heavily upon the music and when the music shall act only as a support.

Reasoning that the importance of music in the presenting of photodramas is now generally recognized, many of the most successful theater managers having made their music a prominent feature of their programs with excellent box office results, Mr. Hadley thinks that the producers and distributors have not kept pace with the exhibitors in this respect and looks forward to the day when music will come into its own and be considered as necessary to pictures as the actors.

PICTURES FOR MAN-O'-WARSMEN AT SEA.

Through the efforts of the War Camp Motion Picture Committee the various ships of the navy on which there is motion picture equipment will be enabled to obtain supplies of recent pictures for their use while at sea. The Bureau of Navigation of the Navy Department has asked the committee for several hundred complete schedules of exchanges for distribution through the Navy Department, and they have been forwarded. Price lists with special rates for entertainments while the boats are in port are also being furnished, together with detailed information as to methods of securing motion picture programs to take to sea. The War Camp Committee has requested the Army and Navy Commissions on Training Camp Activities to furnish the Navy Department with the bulletin lists of pictures selected by the National Board of Review for the Commissions. This will make it practicable for the chaplains on board more than two hundred ships to visit the exchanges nearest the ports of landing of their vessels and obtain such pictures as they desire.

Rolfe Severs Active Connection with Metro

While Retaining Financial Interest in Company Will Make Eight Productions a Year—Florence Reed Engaged.

A STATEMENT from B. A. Rolfe says that he has severed his active connections with the Metro company, although retaining his financial interest, in order that he may devote his entire time to a producing company which he has recently formed and which he has been working on for some months past.

It is the plan of Mr. Rolfe's company to make about eight super-features a year featuring stars of known box-office value in really high-class productions which will not have to depend on the player's drawing power alone to receive a welcome. Mr. Rolfe will supervise all direction and production and says he already has under contract a number of authors and scenario writers.

The first name to be announced in the list of stars for the new company is that of Florence Reed. For her photoplays special material will be secured, the features given a high-class production in every way and will be as nearly perfect as money and brains can make them.

Mr. Rolfe states that announcements as to other stars and matters of interest will be forthcoming within the next week or two.

Great College to Teach Scenario Writing

Class Started at University of California Will Study Script-Building at Tivoli Opera House.

THE University of California has given official recognition to scenario writing as a profession and a class is now being enrolled at the San Francisco office of the University Extension Division, 62 Post street. The T. & D. Tivoli Opera House has been chosen as the classroom for the course, which will be commenced at an early date. Both morning and evening classes will be given and an opportunity will be presented to those having ideas for good moving pictures to learn how to place them in the form of salable manuscripts.

A course of fifteen lectures will be given by Earl Snell, formerly with the California Motion Picture Corporation, and more recently scenario writer for Beatriz Michelena. As soon as a working foundation is laid the study will be confined largely to an analysis of photoplay successes, which will be projected for the benefit of the class. In some instances the selected pictures will be supplemented by portions of the actual scenarios from which they were produced. Many prominent scenario writers have indorsed the course, among these being C. Gardner Sullivan, and the initial enrollment is very satisfactory.

FARNUM MAKES PICTURE FOR BOND CAMPAIGN.

One hundred and twenty prints of a smashing Liberty film in which William Farnum, Fox star, plays the principal role, have just been requested by William G. McAdoo, Secretary of the Treasury, for use in floating the Third Liberty Loan. For more than a month Farnum, his director, Frank Lloyd, and their company of picture players have been utilizing every spare moment at Hollywood, in the production of the film, which is said to be a striking argument for national support of the Liberty Loan in addition to being a highly interesting feature aside from its patriotic aspect.

Arrangements are being made for distribution of the copies through the twelve Federal Reserve state committees throughout the United States.

MARIE DORO FORMS HER OWN COMPANY.

Marie Doro has seen the advantage of a star having her own producing company and has just formed an organization for the purpose of turning out Marie Doro Feature Photoplays. The star will be seen in a series of pictures directed by a man who has had years of experience and written by some of the foremost authors who are preparing scenarios especially suited to the well-known talents of this stage and screen star.

Miss Doro will engage her supporting company, which will include a leading man favorably known and other players whose names are familiar to lovers of motion pictures. Negotiations are now under way with a newly-formed releasing organization.

GENERAL'S NEW YORK EXCHANGE MOVES.

General Film Company's New York sales office has moved from its downtown location to 729 Seventh avenue. The removal was begun April 20. These new quarters consist of the whole ninth floor.

Music of the Future.

IT IS hardly necessary to go back to the piano and drums period of picture presentation for comparison. Just as the picture industry has advanced step by step, so music has kept pace, providing a higher form of entertainment with each upward move. Its mission has been identical with that of better pictures: to draw a better class of patrons. In the infant days of photoplays the class that patronized the "movies" cared little for music, but appreciated the noise. The banging improvisations of a piano player, augmented by the cymbal-crashing drummer, delighted their ears and provided opportunity for loud chatter or louder guffaws.

The exhibitor noted the excellence of the "movie" novelty, saw its wonderful possibilities and wondered why the better class of his neighborhood stayed away. By special publicity he got them to come—once, but they would not return. He thought that the poor ventilation or rough interior of his storeroom were to blame and moved into better quarters. The desired clientele came again, but his new theater knew them no more. He cudgelled his brain for the reason. He felt that his pictures were good. His projection was exceptionally fine. The new home of the silent drama was the last word in "movie" theaters. His interior lighting and lobby lights were strictly up to date, yet there was something lacking somewhere.

He was not in the remotest sense a musician nor even a devotee of the art. He could not whistle a tune to save his bank roll for his vocation was business, not art. His music sounded all right to him and many of his regular patrons expressed themselves delightedly upon the subject. Therefore, although he had changed everything else of the old regime, his piano and drums still kept up the clattering accompaniment to his pictures.

One day he attended an exhibitors' convention in a large city and was surprised to learn that some theaters were spending as high as three hundred dollars a week for musicians. From his practical standpoint it looked like bad business, for he could not see where he could add anything to his overhead expenses and make a living. He admitted subconsciously that a larger body of men looked better, and the music seemed softer and sweeter, but the additional cost could not be compensated for by sweeter sound.

A few days later he was told by a film salesman that in a neighboring town a fellow exhibitor had installed a pipe organ at an expense of $15,000. With gaping mouth and bulging eyes he declared that exhibitors in general had gone crazy over music. He was also informed that the day of the five-cent picture house was gone and that the ruling charge for admission to those houses where the music had been improved was ten and fifteen cents.

Though slow to act he was a good gambler, and forthwith dispensed with his marathon pianist and frolicsome drummer. A five-piece orchestra took their place and his audience missed the noise, but liked the music. At first many of them fell asleep. The rumor went abroad that a "symphony" orchestra was the feature of his theater. The better class of people came again—and stayed. To-day he has another house, bigger, more up to date, changing pictures only twice a week and featuring an orchestra of eighteen pieces and a huge pipe organ played by a capable artist. His box office receipts prove the sound investment made in good music.

To-day we have probably a dozen theaters in America with orchestras of thirty men or more devoted to pictures. Hundreds of houses have large organs, and thousands small orchestral combinations. All this, in spite of the expense incidental to gathering together a good orchestra, the difficulty in procuring proper musical service from producers and the loss of seating capacity by staging the orchestra or placing the organ.

What does the future hold?

Judging from the rapid strides already made we fear to even guess lest our prediction fall far short of the ultimate mark. A review of a few pertinent facts may give some inkling.

To-day every producer realizes the worth of a proper musical setting to his picture and to the best of his ability strives to meet the needs of the exhibitor. Many are providing cue-sheets, while some go to great expense in arranging orchestra scores. No longer is there any apathy shown in the executive offices of the big film magnates when the subject of music is broached. Their house organs are giving music wide publicity. Music service departments are becoming a large factor in the selling of pictures and what the other fellow is doing in this line is closely watched lest he forge ahead of them.

In the theaters the audience is more conversant with the dual art of pictures and music and continually demands a better musical performance. The exhibitor keeps in close touch with his orchestral leader. What was good enough a year ago is distinctly poor to-day. The work of fitting pictures has become more exacting in its detail than ever before. Frequent repetitions of a number are frowned on and woe betide the leader that in a moment of carelessness uses inappropriate music. It is nothing unusual to have people request the musician to give them the name of a particular selection played during a specified scene. This demonstrates the musical educational value of picture music.

In the field of composers, arrangers of scores, and compilers of cue-sheets, we find a well-marked advance of ideas. Those who stuck to the old lines are "falling out" and the gap is filled by more competent artists. Never before has there been such efforts along the line of research work for the arranger. Composers of recognized ability have entered the picture field and find therein wide opportunity for displaying their talent. New music is the continual cry of musicians playing to pictures and that demand must be satisfied only by selections of merit. Any "old thing" is no longer good enough. Music for the pictures must have atmosphere, and be of a form, practical for picture purposes. Shoddy stuff is rejected, but thematic treatment receives instant approbation.

Musical scores are receiving more and more consideration from the producers. The advantages derived from this form of musical accompaniment are manifold. The use of themes for the different characters arranged in varied forms has proved to be the highest form of setting, but has suffered somewhat at the hands of poor arrangers. This form is in its infancy stages and no doubt will be developed to Wagnerian proportions as time goes on. The fitting of features by the process of suiting the dominant emotional scenes is also good and has reached artistic heights. Flash-backs are no longer regarded musically unless their bearing on the plot is consequential.

We feel that the music of the future will be a score that combines both forms of treatment. Each scene will be fitted for its atmosphere, dominant feeling, and tempo, synchronized and properly key-blended, while interwoven will be found the themes significant of the characters in the foreground. Close attention will be paid to orchestral coloring, light and shade, depth and shallowness. Above all, variety will be the keynote of the entire composition. Orchestras everywhere will be enlarged, better organs and more capable organists will be used. The fifth largest industry will become the fourth and hold in its fold the greatest composers, musical directors and virtuoso players of the day.

Though great has been the progress of the silent drama, greater yet has been the advance in its music, and the future holds a promise so stupendous in its magnitude that picture music will rank favorably with grand opera and symphony.

American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers Gain Decision.

In a test case instituted by The St. Nicholas Avenue Amusement Co., asking that the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers be restrained from demanding from them or others similarly situated any license fee as a condition precedent to the playing of any of the musical compositions of the defendants, and from performing any act or acts whatsoever in concert which would prevent the playing by the plaintiff of any of the desired musical compositions of the defendant, Justice Goff denied the motion and gave the following opinion.

"After considering the argument of counsel and their briefs I am of the opinion that the defendant association is exercising only its lawful rights. It existed before the incorporation of the plaintiff and was engaged in the same general work before the plaintiff's existence. The association is formed for lawful purpose, and I find no exercise of any coercion. The institution of legal actions by individual members of the association for violation of copyright is justified for the protection of income from their music. Plaintiff wishes to use the product of the author's labor, ignoring copyright, free of any charge whatever, except the actual purchase price of the printed musical score. There is no restraint of trade through any act of the association. Plaintiff may use any music not the property of the members of the association without objection by the association. The only restraint on plaintiff is the possible right of the authors or owners of such music to prevent its use. The moving picture exhibitors have spent thousands of dollars advertising music which may be used by orchestras irrespective of the wishes of the defendant association or its individual members. The fact that the music of the authors who are members of the association is popular in demand presents just so much more reason why it should be protected and its unauthorized use at public entertainment given for profit, prevented. Practically the exhibitors of moving pictures seek to obtain by injunction the right to publicly perform copyrighted musical compositions for profit without a consent of the holder of copyright and without compensation to him."

Nobody wishes to deprive the author and composer of their royalties. The gift of giving music to the world cannot be estimated in dollars and cents, and no monetary consideration is adequate compensation for musical genius and inspiration. Heretofore, in America, the composers have been at the mercy of the publishers who by the very conditions instant to commercializing an art have been unable to adequately pay him. It is only fair that those who profit by the beautiful melodies, catchy airs, deeply thought and wisely wrought musical epics, should pay for them.

The objection comes in the manner of collecting the playing fee. There seems to be no well defined or set license fee for the playing of any particular number, but each theater must pay a lump sum, which permits the playing of any number from the catalogue controlled by the Society of Authors and Composers. The musician is not charged any additional sum, but the owner of the theater must pay to allow his musicians to play selections by which they obtain their positions and through which they hold them. In other words, the theater manager must pay for music that belongs to the orchestral leader or organist and which goes with the latter when he leaves for pastures new. It would seem that the musician is really the one who profits by the use of the copyrighted numbers, so why charge the theater. There should be found some more equitable method of collecting the playing fee which rightly belongs to the composer.

Music for "The Unchastened Woman."

At the Morosco theater, Sunday, April 21, there was presented the Rialto de Luxe picture, "The Unchastened Woman," adapted and directed by Wm. Humphreys. It was an invitation affair and all the film singers were present. The play from which the picture was evolved was a New York sensation, and like all the Morosco productions enjoyed a long run on Broadway. As evinced by the enthusiasm the picture evoked "The Unchastened Woman" will continue in popularity and grow in the hearts of the picture fans everywhere.

Preceded by the Overture "Il Guarany," by Gomez, the picture was ushered in by the strains of that well known melody, "Serenade," by Schubert. This number was used as the theme of the drama and fitted Miss Valentine's good acting. During the scene showing a drawing room where a few select friends were gathered to listen to a big singer the strains of "Pagliacci" were heard most appropriately. When we were carried to Switzerland the changed atmosphere was carried out in the music and we heard the reminiscences of Alpine yodeling.

The little touches of Auld Lang Syne and Home, Sweet Home, touched the heart with their kindness and brought out the true simplicity of the home life shown. Besides they provided a distinct contrast to such numbers used, like "Unfinished Symphony," by Schubert, the "Prelude" to King Manfred, and the "Pilgrim's Song," by Tschaiowsky.

Synchrony is not possible in a musical setting, yet the breaks were hardly noticeable because of the careful conducting of Mr. Beynon. One thing stood out most noticeably during the presentation of the picture. At no time did the music predominate. The entire accompaniment was played almost pianissimo. As there are no big fight scenes or battle situations this was possible and its soothing effect was only excelled by its good taste.

Producers Deeply Interested in Music.

A recent issue of the Progress-Advance, the house organ of Paramount, tore down all precedent and prejudice and gleefully announced itself as a music number. Musical articles appeared from various capable musicians treating the different phases of picture playing. Nothing has pleased us so well since our last raise in salary.

Truly, music is coming to its own. And why not? What would pictures be without music? Why spend thousands of dollars to entertain people in silence when good music so enhances the presentation of the picture? This recognition of music as a big factor in picture selling is but a forerunner, and as its importance permeates the industry greater stress will be laid on proper musical service to the exhibitor. Music is a limitless art and affords an opportunity for sound selling arguments that cannot be estimated till tried.

Musical Suggestion Synopsis.

BLINDNESS OF DIVORCE (Fox—Six Reels)—Theme not necessary. Note the wedding march in the first reel, followed by slow music of the heavier type. We need the wedding march again in the third reel, along with a fox-trot, Oriental dance and agitato. The last three reels are very dramatic and call for big stuff. There are two court room scenes which could be fitted with the same music to associate the ideas. Cue-sheets can be obtained from the Fox exchange.

BRIDE OF FEAR, THE (Fox—Five Reels)—Theme not necessary. This is a melodrama requiring agitados, hurrys and misteriosos. The first and second reels are intensely dramatic, the third can be fitted with light allegretto stuff, the fourth needs slower music with the exception of the chase, when an agitato will fit. The last wants agitados, misteriosos and dramatic tensions. Cue-sheets can be obtained from the Fox exchange.

Serenaes, caprices and light intermezzos fit this humorous melodrama. A few agitados and light hurrys are needed while a couple of semi-misteriosos will fit nicely into the burglary scenes. Catch the fight in the third reel. Cue-sheet can be obtained from the Goldwyn exchange.

FACE IN THE DARK, THE (Goldwyn—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Andante. Suggest "Clair de Lune"—Thome, "Dialogue"—Helmund-Meyer, or "Pleading"—Wood.

The picture opens brightly and a bit grotesquely. Note the sleigh ride and use "Petersburg Steighride"—Eilenberg, if possible. Catch the piano solo in the fourth reel and the need of a misterioso a little further along. Close with the theme. Cue-sheets can be obtained from the Goldwyn exchange.

FLOOR BELOW, THE (Goldwyn—Six Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Andantino. Suggest "Heloise"—Langey, "Astarte"—Meldenberg, or "Melodie"—Lederer.

With but few moments, this picture can be treated lightly. Intermezzos, mazurkas, waltzes and gavottes will meet most of your requirements. There is a harmonica solo which can be imitated on the organ, if you are fortunate in having one; otherwise disregard it. Cue-sheets can be obtained from the Goldwyn exchange.

GIRL FROM BEYOND, THE (Vitagraph—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Andante. Suggest "Romance"—Grunfeld, "Souvenir"—Geehl, or "Romance"—Rubenstein.

There is a change from eastern to western atmosphere that should be sharply brought out in contrast, to be effective. Dramatic music is required with a touch of the pastorals. Cue-sheets can be obtained from the Vitagraph exchange.

HEART OF THE SUNSET (Goldwyn—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Andante. Suggest "Love Theme"—Lee, or "Extase"—Ganne.

This is a romantic melodrama filled with adventure and deeds of daring. You will require big stuff for this feature. The atmosphere is somewhat Mexican and the free use of Spanish numbers will add to the picture presentation. Catch shots in first and fourth reel. Cue-sheets can be obtained from the Goldwyn exchange.

LEAP TO FAME (World—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Valse Lento. Suggest "Adele Waltzes"—Finn, "Dodola"—Frey, or "Golden Hearted Daisies"—Williams.

A comedy drama, American atmosphere, and requiring light treatment orchestrally. Note Egyptian dance needed in the first reel. A few agitados and hurrys will also come in handy as the picture draws to its close. Cue-sheets can be obtained from the World exchange.

PURPLE LILY, THE (World—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Andante Sostenuto. Suggests "Arabian Nights"—Mildenberg, "On Wings of Love"—Bendix, or "Inspiration"—Edwards.

Bright stuff till the last reel, in which comes a direct cue for "Home, Sweet Home," to be played by violin only. Note shots and sleigh bells. Cue-sheets can be obtained from the World exchange.

RICH MAN, POOR MAN (Paramount—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Allegretto. Suggest "Rainbow Girl"—Hirsch, "Love in Arcady"—Wood, or "Serenade"—Pierne.

Nothing but bright stuff is needed for this vivacious picture. Cue-sheets can be obtained from the Paramount exchange.

RIDERS OF THE NIGHT (Metro—Five Reels)—Theme—Adagio. Suggest "The Broken Melody"—Van Biene, "The Stars are Calling"—Robert, or "Where Blooms the Rose"—Johns.

The entire picture is very dramatic and would ordinarily require many agitados, hurrys and furiosos. It would be better to use standard overtures that have length to them so that choppiness be avoided. Cue-sheets can be obtained from the Metro exchange.

WESTERN BLOOD (Fox—Five Reels)—Theme—Andante. Suggest "Reverie"—Vieuxtemp, "Dawn of Hope"—Cassella, or "Elysium"—Speaks.

Another of those woolly western stories. Bright stuff with a Mexican flavor is what you need. Many fox-trots and agitados are required. Note the Virginia reel needed in the fourth part when they begin to dance. Cue-sheets can be obtained from the Fox exchange.

WITH NEATNESS AND DESPATCH (Metro—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Moderato. Suggest "Delicia"—Frantzen, "Serenade"—Widor, or "Romance"—Merricanto.

This is a comedy drama and should receive light treatment in the main. Note the piano solo to action and the agitados and misteriosos needed in the last reel. Cue-sheets can be obtained from the Metro exchange.

UNCHASTENED WOMAN, THE (Rialto de Luxe—Eight Reels)—See review in another column of this department.

Leaders Service Bureau.

Questions Answered. Suggestions Offered.

Q. "Why should my leader persist in alternating his playing with the piano? First he plays a number, then the pianist plays a number and they keep this up throughout the show. Why?"

A. "There seems to be no reason that we can see unless it is his desire to assure himself that he only works half as hard as the pianist. Music of that kind will kill your business. Better make a change in your orchestra pit."

Q. "While attending a picture house in New York City where they were playing 'The Girl Beyond' I was surprised to hear the orchestra start the 'Selectious from the Mikado' by Sullivan. My disappointment was keen when I found no trace of Japanese atmosphere in the picture. Your articles continually harp on atmospherical fittings. Why don't you do it in New York?"

A. "One 'black eye' for New York. It is too bad you attended a theater which is so far behind the times, to get your impression of New York movies. No doubt this house caters to a portion of the submerged tenth who have no likes or dislikes in the matter of music. The next time you are in New York attend some other theater and tell us what your impressions are."

The Proper Place to Change.

NEVER before have pictures received the careful and close analysis now given them by musical leaders before attempting to fit to music. The selection of cues upon which to change the music becomes the corner stone of the structure and it requires a keen perception of values, a fair knowledge of drama, and an unusual amount of screen sense to lay this firm foundation.

Many places to change can be seen at a glance. A subtitle sometimes indicates by its wording that the scene is to be new, or fade-outs usually mark the end of the present scene. On the other hand a fade-out may bring in a flash-back to the scene. If it be short there is no necessity for changing the color or tempo of the music but if it runs for some length it becomes a serious question to be solved.

Flash packs are not fundamentally scenes in themselves but only the recollection of scenes. If they appear in with a similar tempo and atmosphere the music being played to the existing scene can well be continued. An example of a particularly knotty problem in flash-back setting came before the writer recently.

A girl who has been dragged down into the depths by a profligate youth, tells the story of her downfall to her former lover, who finds her sick and hungry in a squalid tenement. She tells about the meeting of this bad boy at a football game (flash of football game, shouting multitudes, etc.) then how they elope, (flash of automobile and hasty retreat.) She tells how they live together and his promise that he will marry her (flash of home life together) and continues the recital of her wrongs; each episode shown by a flashback.

The dominant emotion of the scene proper was utter grief and desolation. The flashes were varied in their emotions, and extremely short in some cases, while in others protracted. To play sad music throughout the entire scene was out of the question and would ridicule the situations shown in the flashes. To fit each flash and return to the scene proper was impossible. There was only one thing to do. Arrange a sad slow number for the strings alone and as the flashes appeared fit them by using the strings or woodwind (or both) in a number that would suit the situation and sound through the dominant theme yet not predominate. This meant special orchestration to fit the keys and harmonics. The larger picture palaces have on their staff an arranger of more than ordinary ability for just such peculiar problems, which shows the upward trend of picture music.

Another little problem that was incorrectly played by one of our best orchestras, came to surface in a patriotic picture. The mobilization of troops was screened under the subtitles England, Canada, Australia, Scotland, etc., followed by a review of the French troops, then came the marching of Zouaves, and later the Blue Devils. Upon the heels of these appeared a night scene showing marching Belgians.

Analyzing this problem we find three of the Allies represented viz., England, France and Belgium. At first glance three marches are needed, to wit, "Britons Never Will Be Slaves," "March Lorraine," and the Belgian Hymn. The orchestra in question used the "at-first-glance" method and played the suggested numbers.

A further analysis brings more light. Canada has its national song, "The Maple Leaf Forever," which works up nicely as a march. "The Campbells Are Coming" would fit the Scotch laddies, while Australia requires representation by its "Song of Australia," a patriotic air known everywhere. It would be necessary, because of the shortness of the scenes, to use a medley of eight to sixteen bars of each, but this could readily be arranged and would add a big punch to the picture.

So much for the English side. Now coming to the French soldiers, we heard March Lorraine played up to the entrance of the Belgians. It is a well known fact that March Lorraine is only played for French soldiers while on review. Never is it played for marching infantry as they leave for war. On the other hand "Le Chant du Depart" is always sung by soldiers leaving for the front. "Sombre et Meuse" is another well known march admirably suited to this very situation.

A little later in the same picture a situation arises that may confuse the average leader but which was handled accurately by the orchestra mentioned above. American soldiers are shown marching down Fifth avenue, New York, a little later after a subtitle "In London" they are shown marching in England, and again, after the subtitle "In Paris" they are marching in France. Because of the change of atmosphere one would be tempted to change the music but this would be distinctly poor policy. The soldiers are American, they are the same soldiers, and whether in England or France they still retain their nationality and characteristic fire and dash. "The Stars and Stripes Forever" by Sousa was the march used throughout and fitted the conditions perfectly.

We firmly believe that no picture can be fitted at one viewing without missing many important details or sacrificing some important changes in the music. Picture fitting is no longer a question of slapping together a lot of music but has become an exact science. The day has arrived when producers fear music because of its power to ruin their feature if not properly arranged. Music is the fulcrum from which can be raised a feature to great heights by the lever of good musical sense.

"The Lost Chord,"

First Symphony for Motion Pictures.

Announcing Arthur Sullivan's famous song, "The Lost Chord," as the subject of his first Cinema-Symphony, Hopp Hadley speaks of his work as "a new-idea-illustrated-symphony made possible by the art of the motion picture." The feature is in five reels and he claims that, even without the Symphony, it is a powerful drama with a beautiful heart interest story destined to be popular as a regulation photodrama with an ordinary "cue sheet" accompaniment.

The idea of symphonic pictures is a good one and is not only appealing in its novelty but carries with it true merit. "The Lost Chord" is especially adaptable to the idea, as symphony in its true musical sense is not exactly "corned beef and cabbage" to the tired business man, while its application in the beautiful story written around Arthur Sullivan's popular song is so simple that a child can readily grasp the idea and is affected almost as much by the music as by the story.

Simply told, Mr. Hadley has taken a song dear to the hearts of the people and written a photoplay based upon its libretto. The music of the song will provide an accompaniment and at the same time tell the story by its melody, change of rhythm and interpretation. This is another evidence that picture music is forcing itself into real recognition as a potent factor in picture selling.

Mr. Hadley says, "It is only a question of time when music will receive full recognition as the real business partner of pictures. Early in the history of the screen entertainment, music and pictures were found to be even more closely allied in the successful interpretation of the elements that play upon the emotions, than are music and the spoken drama. But the tendency is still to consider music merely the same support to the picture as to the stage play. However, the possibilities offered by the silent drama—because it is silent—for the supreme enjoyment of beautiful music are fast gaining recognition, and I believe that the time is near, if indeed it has not now arrived, when soul-inspiring music and tense heart interest drama will be so combined that music will bear its full share in the telling of the story.

We are strongly in favor of this advance in picture production and we feel sure that every exhibitor will welcome this new form of entertainment because of its educational value, its heart interest and artistic musical angle. The putting together of and arranging for a symphony based on a song is a colossal work and requires artists of big caliber if the ultimate result is to reach a standard worthy of the idea itself.

Practically speaking, this is an example of a picture run to music, and if the music be mediocre in its symphonic qualities it will perforce kill the picture. Mr. Hopp Hadley's wide experience as a musician as well as a producer is sufficient guarantee that the music will be of the highest order, and we anticipate with pleasure the advent of this new era in pictures.

Music at the Strand.

During the week, beginning April 28, the Strand devoted its entire gross receipts to the buying of Liberty Bonds and placed on its boards a thoroughly patriotic show from the overture to the closing organ solo.

The overture, "Pomp and Circumstance," conducted by Oscar Sprescu, stirred the blood of every patriotic patron and received well-merited applause. This number was written by Sir Edward Elgar as a coronation march for King Edward VII and was published in the form of a song entitled "Land of Hope and Glory." It instantly met the popular tastes of the people, and its success was phenomenal. Many musicians have criticized its light vein, claiming that it falls far below "Dream of Gerontius" and other similar big works, but its irresistible melody has won the hearts of the people the world over.

The music selected for the animated cartoon, The Sinking of the Lusitania, showed fine judgment and careful thought, attentions which are not usually given to this class of picture. The music made the picture. A heart interest was created by the use of the hymn "Nearer, My God, to Thee" as the Lusitania sank below the waves.

Only one vocal number graced the program, owing to the extreme length of the feature which followed it. The Strand Soldiers Quartette sang a medley of patriotic airs, not expertly from the standpoint of voice technique but fervently. The lighting effects were wonderful. A back drop showed a cluster of tents with lights twinkling here and there, while on the left flowed a silver river glistening in the moonlight. The boys wore the regulation army uniforms and sat about their camp fire as they sang. As the last few bars were heard, there was flashed on the blue of the sky, the head of Washington, then Lincoln, and lastly, amid thunderous applause, President Wilson. The number was most effective as an introduction to the big feature, "My Four Years in Germany."

The musical setting given to the feature was one of the best we have heard. Its dynamic force and careful continuity showed much forethought in preparation. Mr. Edouarde can be congratulated for his excellent selection of numbers, which were most appropriate. A rather unusual feature was the sequence of keys noted in changing from one number to the other. The organ further enhanced this feature by preparing for the orchestral number to follow. Especially was it effective in the paraphrasing of the Marseillaise during the scene showing the portrait of Napoleon. The work of the Strand Symphony Orchestra grows continually better and sets a standard of musical interpretation that is hard to live up to.

French Society of Authors, Composers and Publishers.

Mr. Oscar Osso has been appointed by the French Society of Authors, Composers and Publishers as its sole agent for North and South America. The function of this organization is practically identical with that of the American Society, in that they control a large catalogue of French copyrighted music which heretofore has been played free of license fee but in the future will be taxable.

The recent legal decisions favorable to the American Society has opened the way for the French Society to lawfully collect a royalty on all music played from its catalogue.

We are not fully informed regarding the modus operandi to be followed, but the French Society can well profit by the mistakes made by the American Society. The exhibitor is a reasonable fellow and is perfectly willing to pay his share of anything that furthers his business of showing pictures, but he will fight unfair imposts or officious impostors with all the strength at his command.

In Europe it is customary to charge a license fee to the theater, and usage has created a condition acceptable to theater managers. But this is America. Our business principles are different. Our long freedom from music taxation makes it imperative that the new license be laid on the shoulders of the exhibitor with care and gentleness, not thrust upon them arbitrarily. If the French Society will tax the musician through the publisher, the exhibitor will gladly add to the salary of his orchestra, and thus indirectly pay the fee to hear music otherwise withheld from him. Let it also be understood that whatever playing royalty be charged, and in whatever manner collected, it will remain a fixed amount and not subject to change at every whim or convenience of the society.

Musical Suggestion Synopsis.

BUSY INN, THE (Pathe—Five Reels)—Theme—Andante and Russian. Suggest "Russian Romance"—Friml, or "A Russian Pansy"—Langey.

This intense drama takes place in Russia entirely and should be fitted with nothing but Russian characteristic music. The following list may be helpful to the leader in procuring suitable music:

"Chanson Triste"	Tschaikowsky
"Cosatschoque"	Dargomijsky
"Gondoliera"	Moszkowski
"Kamnoi Ostrow"	Rubinstein
"Kol Nidre"	Roberts
"Kol Nidrei"	Bruch
"Kosatzki"	Bloom
"Moments Musical"	Moszkowski
"Moszkowskiana"	Moszkowski
"Musical Gems of Tschaikowsky"
"A Polish Dance Theme"	Scharwenka
"Reve Angelique"	Rubinstein
"A Russian Pausy"	Langey
"Scherezazada"	Rimsky-Korsakow
"Song of the Boatman of the Volga"	Cady
"Cossack Lullaby"	Jiraneck
"Two Slavonic Dauces"	Dvorak

Cue sheets can be obtained from the Pathe exchange.

DOG'S LIFE, A (Chaplin—Three reels)—Theme unnecessary.

This is a slapstick comedy requiring two drummers and all the traps in the world. The music should be light, using "You Made Me What I Am Today" when girl sings, and "Down on the Farm" in the last reel where Charlie is shown planting potatoes. Obtain as much of a burlesque effect as possible. Cue sheets can be obtained from the First National Exhibitors' exchange.

HEARTS OR DIAMONDS (Mutual—Five Reels)—Theme—Moderato. Suggest "Sunshine of Your Smile," a semi-classical song by Lillian Ray. This theme is especially suited to the heroine and is easily procurable.

The story is intensely dramatic and requires big stuff in the last three reels. Note the fights in the beginning of the fourth reel. The first two reels can be fitted with light serenade music. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Mutual exchange.

HIS OWN HOME TOWN (Paramount—Five Reels)—Theme—Allegretto. Suggest "It's Nice to Meet a Fellow from Your Own Home Town"—Remick, or "Little Serenade"—Grunfeldt.

This is a light comedy picture with a touch of Irish-American in it. It would be well to use a few folk-songs of the Irish flavor to lend spice to the setting. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paramount exchange.

JOAN OF PLATTSBURG (Goldwyn—Six Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Andante. Suggest "Love Song"—Nevin, "Melody in G-flat"—Cadman, or "Rosemary"—Elgar.

This is a patriotic drama filled with the fire of youth and love of country. It needs martial music throughout. You will need "March Lorraine," "Sombre et Meuse," medley of American patriotic airs and the "Marseillaise." Cue sheets can be obtained from the Goldwyn exchange.

JOURNEY'S END (World—Five Reels)—Theme—Andantino. Suggest "Adieu"—Friml, "Serenade"—Strube, or "Enchanted Hour"—Mouton.

This is a light drama with American atmosphere, calling for intermezzos, serenades and serenatas. In the last reel a bit of agitato and misterioso music can be used effectively. Cue sheets can be obtained from the World exchange.

MLISS (Artcraft—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Allegretto. Suggest "La Caresse"—Hemberger, "Al Fresco"—Etienne, or "Barchetta"—Nevin.

This is typically a Pickford picture requiring light and dainty treatment. Note the schoolroom scene in the fourth reel and use "School-days" by Edwards or "I Can't Do That Sum" from Victor Herbert's "Babes in Toyland." A bit of Southern atmosphere will enhance this picture. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Artcraft exchange.

RULER OF THE ROAD (Pathe—Five Reels)—Theme—Dramatic Andante. Suggest "Reverie"—Vieuxtemp, "Romance in F"—Tschalkowsky, or "Three Songs from Eiland"—Von Fielitz.

This is a railroad story. Railway effects can be appropriately used by the drummer if he follows the action on the screen. There are some pathetic scenes and the climax is dramatic. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Pathe exchange.

TREASURE OF THE SEA (Metro—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Andante. Suggest "Dialogue"—Meyer-Helmund, "Love-Song"—Powell, or "Daffodills"—Carvel.

This is a very dramatic picture that contains intrigue and fight scenes. Heavy stuff must be used with a big agitato overture in the last reel. Also note the shot effect in this reel. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Metro exchange.

TWO-SOUL WOMAN, THE (Universal—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Andante. Suggest "All for You"—Herbert (from Princess Pat), "Melodie"—Huerter, or "Roma"—Edwards.

You will need some big stuff for this picture and a few dramatic tensions. Note the violin solo in the opening of the second reel. A wedding march is required in the fifth, and a few fox-trots, a couple of hurrys and a misterioso should be handy. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Universal exchange.

Leaders' Bureau.

Questions Answered and Suggestions Offered.

Q. How can I manage to give a smooth and connected performance by using cue sheets? Would you suggest the pianist improvising when the key sequences permitted until the change can be blended or modulated?

A. In order to gain smoothness of sequence it is always wise to finish at the end of a strain, gradually diminishing as the cue appears. Begin the following number pp, crescendoing up to the normal volume. It is always unwise to use a piano interlude as a modulation between the numbers as it breaks the continuity of the color scheme.

Q. What is the average pay for leaders (Union) in New York picture theaters, and what do the "side pieces" get?

A. The average salary given to the orchestra leaders of the large picture houses is about $150 a week, while leaders of the less important theaters receive from $50 to $80 per week. The Union scale for players runs from $28 to $43.50 per week.

Q. I notice there seems to be some difference of opinion in some of the trade periodicals as to organs, orchestra and orchestral organs. Please tell me wherein lies the difference between an organ and an orchestral organ?

A. The church-organ, or pipe-organ, is a keyboard wind instrument consisting of few or many sets of pipes played from one or more keyboards; there may be five keyboards for the fingers (manuals), and there is generally one for the feet (pedal, or keyboard). The pipes, of which there are two main divisions, flue-pipes and reed-pipes, are arranged in sets (registers, or stops) and made to speak by wind admitted from the bellows or pressing the keys.

The orchestral organ is one built on the same principles as the pipe-organ, but to which has been added attachments which produce drum effects, xylophone, automobile honks, fire bells, bird calls, steamboat whistles, etc.

One is a scrulous lustrument, incapable of frivolity, while the other becomes actually frolicsome at times.

Q. Is Shubert's "Unfinished Symphony" really unfinished, or is it just a title given it by the composer?

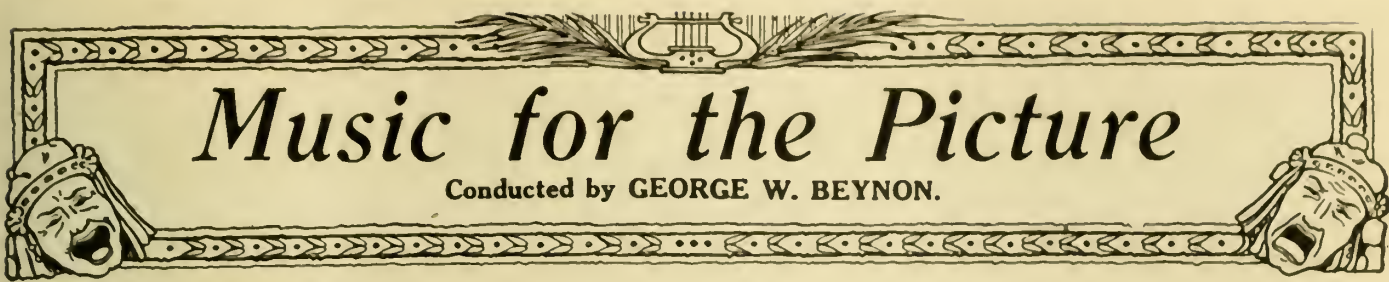

A. When Shubert died there was found amongst his unfinished mss. a symphony he had been working on but had not completed. It was afterwards finished by a contemporary and called "Shubert's Unfinished Symphony."

Q. Are there words to "Missouri Waltz"?

A. We have never heard of any words ever published for this waltz.

Q. My orchestra pit is built so high that the lights on the musicians' stands reflect on my screen, although they use shades. If the shades are turned so as to keep the light off the screen, then my patrons complain that they "get an eye-full." What would you do—sacrifice the screen or let the patrons suffer? Some people kick at anything.

A. I would build a rail in front of the orchestra and use a curtain of some dark material, then the musicians can take their lights and turn them away from the screen without annoying your patrons. If the rail should interfere with the audience seeing the screen, then I would suggest using paper shades in addition to the others, preferably of an orange tint.

What About Summer Music?

THIS summer should make little difference in the box office receipts of picture theaters throughout the country. What traveling is done must be confined to America or Canada, as the facilities for getting elsewhere are limited. The drain upon the pocketbook of the general public, made by Liberty Loan subscriptions, Red Cross campaigns, Y. M. C. A. funds and Boy Scouts' movement would seem to indicate that the majority of us will have to be contented by a vacation at home this year. Another reason why people will not probably go away is their deep sense of patriotism. Is it right that we should indulge ourselves when every dollar is needed to crush out the menace of autocracy? By these deductions we can safely conclude that people will remain close to their homes this summer or, if outings be arranged, they will be of short duration.

Now, Mr. Exhibitor, if the people of your neighborhood, town or city stay at home what are you going to offer them? Are you inclined to follow the practices of past years and cut down or throw out your orchestra about June 1st on the plea of expecting poor business?

We have never quite understood this prevalent procedure because the theater is the loser in every instance. At a glance it would seem that the exhibitor saves money by releasing his orchestra and cutting his salary list, but that very action brands his house in no uncertain terms of cheapness from the standpoint of the regular patrons.

He lowers the standard of his performance, but does not think of lowering his admission fee. A patron having been regular in attendance during the winter finds that his faithfulness in coming during the time of crowded houses is rewarded by a mediocre show at the same price, when he can obtain a seat without doing violence. Naturally that one will kick and go elsewhere. When autumn comes again he has been weaned away and the theater knows his presence no more.

In talking over this matter with a typical movie man we were informed that the above argument was truly sound, but that nearly everybody of any consequence in his neighborhood went away in the summer and the few that remained could not make any material difference in his cash box if they stayed away entirely.

"Then why not close your theater altogether?" he was asked.

"I can't do that because my opposition house keeps open and, besides, my film bookings would not permit of it," he replied, and proceeding, added "My patrons do not expect as good a show in the summer as they do in the winter. They know what I'm up against and they fully understand that I am not in business for my health."

"Then why not run cheaper pictures?" we queried.

"No, I can't do that because my contracts with the producers give me the sole right to exhibit their output in this district. I am forced through competition to play the best pictures I can get or quit business."

"Do you realize the vital importance of good and suitable music in presenting your pictures?" we asked.

"Well, we get good music from our lady pianist in the summer months. She has been with us for years, and if the theater up the street hadn't put in an orchestra we never would have inaugurated such a hill of expense."

"Does your competitor dismiss his orchestra for the summer months?"

"He sure does. If he didn't we would have to keep ours and lose more money than we do. Orchestras cannot be used in the lean months. The overhead has to be cut somewhere and the music department is the least essential."

Now that you have reached this paragraph we ask you to contain your enthusiasm for the words of wisdom you expect to hear from us and start rereading, beginning at the paragraph "In talking over this matter, etc."

You have reread it—Fine. Now there is only one conclusion to be drawn. This exhibitor doesn't give three hoots for his patrons, winter or summer. He tries to hog the best pictures to draw patronage from the other fellow. In fact he is continually scheming to "get by" with a show at the least possible expense, using his competitor as a criterion, and charge as much as he can, again using his competitor as a criterion. He has no individuality, no initiative, no sense of showmanship, and no humanity.

The best theaters have established a standard performance (due care being given to the music) and conscientiously endeavor to maintain it through the year. They become known for their excellent programs. The public know what to expect and are never disappointed. No doubt the theater loses money in the summer, but the added attendance during the winter months make up for it. Nothing can be gained by losing patrons in the summer whose places are taken by new faces in the winter. Why not keep the old and gain the new?

As we pause to glance over what we have written we inadvertently notice that we are supposed to write about summer music and must needs get to the subject.

Let this summer be epochal for the musician everywhere. Make his hours a bit easier during the hot weather. Get together with him and draft up some plans for the winter. Try out some innovations in the music line. The pit is very hot for the players; why not place them on the stage if you have one. By placing them out of sight you can find out whether your patrons like concealed music or not. The orchestra will be more comfortable and the newness of the idea may commend itself to the audience.

A local singer frequently adds to the drawing power of a theater and, as they are not expensive, it might not be a bad plan to try one out on the summer audience. If she's a hit you can broaden out with better talent as the season progresses.

This year will be unusually good and if anything the orchestra should be enlarged. Why not try the scheme of open-air concerts played by your orchestra? At a given hour each evening, on the green adjacent to your theater, have your orchestra render a big overture, a light opera selection and a popular song, new march, or bright waltz. The entire program should not exceed 30 minutes and could be given as the opening to your performance, which would begin in the theater immediately after the open-air concert.

This advantage of getting the people out can be readily seen, and the publicity angle cannot be overlooked.

By no means cut your orchestra this year. People must be amused, and as the legitimate shows are about to close they will flock to the places of picture amusement. Do your bit by keeping up the depressed spirits of a sorrowing nation.

Music at the Rivoli.

During the week of May 6-13 we dropped into the Rivoli to see what new idea Mr. Rothapfel had started in the line of music. We found the gentleman away and the music suffering for his absence. There is no gainsaying the fact that when "Roxy" is on the job things go with a verve that is not found when he is away.

The overture conducted by Mr. Rapee got nowhere. The motifs were not sharply brought out, and in many instances the music became conglomerate. We cannot blame the orchestra for this, nor the composer. The attacks were poor, but no doubt the heat of the evening had its depressing effect, and we prefer to censure the weather.

The music for the educational, showing the glacier effects in the Rocky Mountains was well selected and beautifully played. The people about us seemed to really enjoy it from every standpoint and their feelings accurately reflected ours. Nothing is so pleasing as a scenic played well and appropriately. The difficulty in fitting this class of picture lies only in the fact that there is little pastorate music to be obtained without considerable research work on the part of the musical director.

The pictorial review received the usual good setting. The Japanese number and the interwoven Allies theme were the outstanding good points, but some one's foot slipped somewhere when a march was played while the "Jackies" were dancing a two-step on the Coney Island beach. The excuse, if there could be such a thing, would be that it was too short a scene to bother with. The fact remains that the playing of a march made the scene ridiculous and caused a ripple of smiles to light the faces of the audience.

The feature, "Mile-a-Minute Kendall," required nothing but light music and it would seem that there could not be any error in the fitting of this light picture, yet after the explosion in the first reel the orchestra played a hurry. It is true that the sound of the explosion threw the household into violent agitation for about three seconds, but the dramatic aspect of the situation seemed paramount. It is not the big situations that need the care in choosing music, because they almost take care of themselves; it is the little detailed effects that require judgment and test the leader's ability. The use of "We Won't Go Home 'til Morning" showed had taste. The dominant emotion of the scene where the mother had waited up all night for her wayward son bespoke maternal affection of the deepest kind and her theme could have been repeated here most effectively. In passing we might say that the use of Romberg's "Mother" proved a worthy theme.

Musical Suggestion Synopsis.

DAGGER WOMAN, THE (Pathe—Five Reels)—Theme—Andante and Russian. Suggest Chanson Triste—Tschalkowski, Moment Musical Moszkowski, of Nocturne—Krzyszowski.

Russian music must be used throughout this picture, as the action takes place entirely in Russia. Dramatic music with a few light intermezzos will be useful. La Boheme might be used successfully if led up to by a number not too pronounced in its Russian characteristics. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Pathe exchange.

LITTLE RUNAWAY, THE (Vitagraph—Five Reels)—Theme—Valse Lento. Suggest Kathleen—Berg, Destiny—Baynes, or Heartstrings—Vecsey.

The atmosphere is distinctly Irish. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Vitagraph exchange.

MASKS AND FACES (World—Six Reels—Theme—Andante and dignified. Suggest Dialogue—Meyer-Helmard, Extase—Ganne, or Meditation—Delmas.

The play takes place in the Eighteenth Century and must be flavored strongly with old English airs. Guard against the use of a popular hit number of the present day, and if music of today must be played choose something comparatively unknown. Cue sheets can be obtained from the World exchange.

NINE-TENTHS OF THE LAW (Atlantic Distributing Co.—Six Reels)—Theme unnecessary.

The picture is big in dramatic value and should call forth wonderful music. Note the pastorate effects needed in the fourth reel and the fight a little later. Cue sheets can be obtained.

PAYING HIS DEBTS (Triangle—Five Reels)—Theme—Moderato. Suggest Basket of Roses—Allers, Intermezzo—Heurter, or Legend—Friml.

This is a Western story requiring the usual hurrys for hold-ups, agitados for ambush and misteriosos for mysteries. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Triangle exchange.

PLAYING THE GAME (Paramount—Five Reels)—Theme—Allegretto. Suggest Serenade—Pierre, or Along Came Another Little Girl, from Jack o' Lantern—Caryll.

The music is light throughout and due care should be used in marking the change from Eastern to Western life. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paramount exchange.

REASON WHY, THE (Select—Five Reels)—Theme—Andante. Suggest Russian Romance—Friml, To a Star—Leonard, or Hearts Desire—Losey.

The atmosphere is English and the story dramatic. Big stuff needed all the way through. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Select exchange.

SEAL OF SILENCE, THE (Vitagraph—Five Reels)—Theme—Moderato. Suggest Romance—Mericante; Amaranthus—Gilder, or Serenade—Karganoff.

A society drama with a punch to it. The story runs smoothly and needs only a fair selection of dramatic stuff. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Vitagraph exchange.

VENGEANCE (World—Six Reels)—Theme—Moderato and Oriental. Suggest Oriental Love Song—Kiefert, or Less Than the Dust—Woodforde Findin.

The picture deals with the Orient and the atmosphere is distinctly East Indian with the exception of a few hundred feet taken in England. This gives you a big chance for Oriental music and the suggested list may help to add to your library:

- Danse Orientale Lubomlrsky
- Egyptian Dance Friml

ZONGAR (Physical Culture Plays, Inc.—Five Reels)—Theme—Moderato. Suggest Eleanor—Deppon, Roses and Memories—Spector, or "Serenade—Leander.

This is a strong dramatic situation in which you will require misteriosos, dramatic agitados, hurrys and many dramatic tension numbers. The drummer should watch for dog barking, shots, fore, automobile and aeroplane effects. Cue sheets can be obtained.

Leaders' Service Bureau.

Questions Answered—Suggestions Offered.

Q. Does the title, "The Lost Chord," imply that there is something musically "lost" or incorrect in the composition?

A. By no means. There is a story in connection with this song, in which it is alleged that Sir Arthur Sullivan, while seated at the organ Improving, struck a chord wonderfully beautiful. In his enthusiasm of development he proceeded, believing that he would remember the chord, but found on attempting it that he had lost it entirely. For weeks he searched the keys for this chord and was unable to find it.

Q. The "younger set" in my town have been pretty good patrons of my theater. Occasionally they give a dance and want to use my orchestra at nine o'clock. My closing time is ten-thirty, and because I have refused to let my orchestra off ahead of time they have boycotted my house. What would you suggest doing?

A. Stick to your policy. The man who comes in at nine-thirty and expects to hear the music is entitled to get what he pays for. A little firmness and a good show will bring the young folks back.

Q. Do you consider a harmonium necessary when I have an organ and a piano?

A. No, because you have all the excellent qualities of the harmonium in the organ, besides having a better solo instrument.

Q. Where can I buy some good silk E violin strings. The ones I've been getting recently have been simply rotten. What is your opinion of a wire E string?

A. Try G. Schirmer, Inc., Three West Forty-third street, New York City. Wire E strings are not good for solo playing but hold up well under a grind.

Q. I play 'cello; would I have much difficulty in learning to play cello-banjo?

A. It depends entirely upon you; if you are apt you will not have much trouble. Why do you want to handle a banjo when you can play cello?

Q. Is there a published score for "Lest We Forget," and where can I get it?

A. There is not, but the original mss. score can be obtained from the Rita Jolivat Film Co., 220 West Forty-second street, New York City.

Q.—"I want to better my position as a leader. What is the best way to go about it?"

A.—"Send us full particulars regarding your qualifications, your past experience, stating what salary you want and any preference you may have, and we will try to find the vacancy for you. There is no charge for this service, unless you desire an answer to your letter, when four cents should be sent to cover postage."

Q. I am the leader in a fair-sized town and we play the best pictures that are procurable. My boss is an independent, booking wherever he finds the best drawing cards. His usual buy is from a state's right agency. Some of his pictures are direct from New York, after a Broadway run, and I can, after great trouble, procure scores for my orchestra to play, others have cue sheets, while some have no musical suggestions whatever. My position here is a good one with the exception of the tremendous amount of hunting that I am forced to do in order to get some idea of what to play for our shows. What can you suggest to help me?

A. My dear brother, you are contending with the same conditions that prevail all over the country. Producers, especially independent producers, are most careless regarding the needs of the musician. You can do nothing better than you have been doing, but if you will mail us a list of your future releases we can tell you what provision has been made for music on each release. If you will pay the postage incidental to getting them to you we will be glad to see that you are supplied with musical suggestions on each, at the earliest possible moment.

Q. I see so many references to "Prometheus" music. Who is the composer and what character is it?

A. To answer your last question first, we would say that the music given this title is usually somewhat dramatic. The "Prometheus" by Beethoven is very dramatic, while that of Lizst holds a lighter vein. There have been other composers who have attempted "Prometheus" also. If you need it for pictures we would advise the two mentioned as more adaptable to your needs.

Q. What instrumentation would you suggest for an airdome picture place?

A. Piano, Violin Conductor, First Violin, Flute, Clarinet, Cornet, Trombone, Drums, 'Cello, Bass, Violins, Second Violins, Viola, Horns, Second Cornet, Second Clarinet, Oboe, Basson and Harp in the order named. If the size of your orchestra desired be only five instruments, take the first four and add Drums; if it be seven or more, take them in order as arranged above.

What Availeth It?

WITH all the facilities that New York offers in procuring music, with the eloquent examples of picture presentation of the Strand, Rialto and Rivoli, with good musicians looking for work and in spite of what we are trying to do to elevate the standard of music in the picture theaters through the columns of The Moving Picture World, we have at our door an exhibitor who has evidently closed his eyes and ears. The saddest part of it all is the fact that he alone suffers for his negligence.

This theater is situated on Broadway and draws its patrons from one of the best residential neighborhoods in the city. Riverside Drive is only a short block away, and picture fans abound in great numbers in this district. The exhibitor books Paramount, Vitagraph and other big features. The theater has a roomy, comfortable and well ventilated auditorium. Its entrance and lobby is attractive, while the best taste prevails in its advertising. It is up-to-date in everything but its music.

Such music! It is hardly conceivable that a theater could be so lax in this most important phase of picture presentation. No fault can be found with the instrumentation. An orchestral organ of the best make and a good piano play the show, sometimes together, but as a rule one relieves the other.

Saturday, May the 11th, feeling the need of relaxation without too much exertion to obtain it, we visited this theater and noted that Ethel Clayton was billed in "The Journey's End." We arrived in time for the beginning of a new show and immediately the Screen Telegram began showing us the news of the week. The pianist tackled the job of playing the News, and although he improvised, his work showed a clear comprehension of what was needed. His changes of music were well timed and sanely suitable. The comedy followed and was treated in the same careful manner. Of course it was slapstick humor and required only light music. We were pleased and contented. Nothing could be better.

Then came the feature. This picture is a society drama, the locations being in New York and Palm Beach. The heroine, finding that her husband is a philanderer among women, decides to gain a separation agreement much against her inner desire. The agreement is made and she leaves for Palm Beach, while hubby, the hero, moons about New York, wondering what he has lost. The villainess, his particular friend, begins to pall and he hastens after his wife, finding when he arrives that she is evidently interested in somebody else. The plot thickens and is well sustained in suspense.

The organ was used to accompany the feature, and opening up all the stops he lit into it with the energy derived from a long rest. We guessed he was exercising the beast to find out if all its joints were in trim. He was evidently feeling out its good points and testing its volume, preparatory to its long grind. Thoroughly satisfied that every register was in working order and the sleigh bells, chimes and steam whistles could be relied upon, he gracefully glided into a light fox trot, while the heroine despondently held conference with her attorney relative to a separation agreement. After that he never looked at the picture except once, and played whatever came into his head, irrespective of the screen situations presented.

Everything played was popular and melodious. When the heroine was seen in a speedy motor boat he struck up that old familiar ballad entitled "Row, Row, Row," and our inclination was strong to go down and yank him out of the pit for daring to burlesque the picture.

When the girls were leaving the Hotel Ponciana for a surf bath, he regaled our ears with "La Paloma," and was not satisfied until he had played it through twice. "La Paloma" is Spanish or Mexican in its atmosphere and had no place in the picture. The girls found no Spaniards on the beach, nor was there even a cactus plant in sight. In the hotel lobby, however, there stood a rubber plant, which our worthy organist may have mistaken for a cactus and based his theme thereon.

While the hero, who had followed his wife to Palm Beach in spite of a separation agreement, was arranging a day's outing (getting a boat and fishing tackle) we were treated to "The Glow Worm." It is true worms were used for bait, but they were not glow-worms. Visualize the situation. A down-hearted hero desiring the seclusion of the open lake for a day's fishing and mental deliberation, while the music says "Shine little Glow Worm, glimmer, glimmer." The absurdity of it all is almost terrifying.

The picture producer should have some legal redress against the exhibitor for holding up his good picture to ridicule. We are all known by our works and yet a producer can be seriously misjudged when a picture is musically mangled by an insensate and insipid saphead.

When the villainess calls on the heroine to flaunt her love for the hero and the scene is fraught with pent-up emotion, shrewd innuendos, and looks that speak volumes, the music that should have raised this dramatic scene on its crest was "Mighty Lak a Rose" by Nevin. Poor Nevin!

As the picture progressed, the fag ends knotted together, and the climax in sight a one-step was used to convey the anticipatory suspense. Then when her rival cleverly induces the heroine to go to a gentleman's house at a late hour expecting to find her husband there and finds it a trap—when hubby comes and attempts to break in the door while they let the wife out the back door—when the hero gets in, draws his revolver and is about to shoot his best friend thinking evil of him, the organist suddenly remembers a beautiful little bell solo and forthwith inflicts it on the audience.

These are only a few examples of what the music did to the picture.

After the plot is ironed out, explanations have been made and the hero has spurned the villainess a sub-title was thrown on the screen. It proclaimed "Morning" and showed the bad woman leaving for parts unknown, husband and wife united and a wedding of "best friend" and "sister." The organist, feeling that it was full time the picture was over, glanced up and caught the title. Instantly he dashed into Grieg's "Morning." As every one knows, this delicate number is pastoral, light and airy, significant of hills and valleys, sheep and their shepherd, and all that goes to display the glories of Nature.

As the people left the theater we heard from all sides audible and bitter complaints about the picture. The fault did not lie with the picture. Its story, action, locations and camera angles were good, while its detail, with but few exceptions, was true to life. It was above the average good feature, but was killed by the bad music which accompanied it.

There is only one ultimate end to a place of this kind if such noisy and noisome picture fitting be allowed to continue. Appropriate music for pictures is the call of the day and people will not long stand for bone-headed carelessness, especially when they must pay for it. Exhibitors everywhere should keep in close touch with their music, cooperate with their organists or leaders and make every effort to safeguard and enhance the feature which has cost so much to produce for the pleasure and edification of their clientele.

Music at the Strand.

During the week of May 12 the Strand theater offered one of its standard performances that one can always rely upon to be interesting. The overture, "Light Cavalry," by Franz Suppe, was given a beautiful setting with special lighting effects that made the old "war horse" sound like something new. Oscar Spirescu interpreted the number a little differently from what we have become accustomed to hear and it was a new delight from that standpoint also.

Miss Irene Audrey, a soprano of great promise, sang "The Villanelle," by Del'Aqua, in an artistic and pleasing manner. She found instant favor in the eyes of her audience and sang with an easy grace that went far to make up for a little huskiness in the early part of the song. "The Villanelle" is by no means a selection for beginners in the gentle art of singing. It requires a bel canto that can readily change to delicate staccato without any apparent effort. Miss Audrey possesses the very voice for this kind of work and showed clever dexterity in her florid passages.

The feature was fitted with the same care that always prevails at The Strand. Nazimova in the Gypsy character of Zorah in the "Toys of Fate" provided a splendid opportunity for atmospheric music. The violin solo that comes as a direct cue throughout the picture was well played and followed the action minutely. We hoped that we were to hear Dvorak, Liszt and excerpts from Bizet's "Carmen," but were disappointed. There could be no fault found with the setting as Mr. Edouarde had arranged it, but a little music more familiar to the public would not have come amiss.

There was one effect in the picture that had to be done off stage and through an accident of some sort was late, causing a laugh all over the house. It was really funny. In the court room scene where a jury has just acquitted Zorah of the murder of her husband, her Gypsy lover suddenly rises and shoots her. We saw him do it. We saw the smoke lift and clear away. The culprit was seized by the police and Zorah had swooned in the arms of her lawyer. Then we heard the long delayed shot. Fortunately the climax had been reached and the faux pas proved a blessing in relieving the tension of one's nerves.

Henry Miller, bass, sang "God Be with the Boys Tonight," by Sanderson. The only reason why the song should be, lies in its patriotic appeal. It lacks melody and is distinctly mediocre in composition. Mr. Miller did not help it any by his rendition.

The balance of the program, consisting of the Strand Topical Review, Outing—Chester and the Comedy, were well played by the Strand Symphony Orchestra, assisted by our worthy friend and able organist, Ralph H. Brigham.

Musical Suggestion Synopsis.

HOW COULD YOU, CAROLINE? (Pathe—Five Reels). Theme—Moderato. Suggest "Song D'Amour"—Schuberth, "Canzonetta"—Nicode or Eleanor-Deppen.

The picture is light and should receive similar treatment. Use melodious music. A few agitato of the lighter variety are needed toward the close of the picture. Cue sheets may be obtained from the Pathe Exchange.

MEN (Bacon-Backer—Six Reels). Theme—Andante. Suggest "Claire de Luna"—Massenet, "Intermezzo"—Whepley, or "Elysium"—Speaks. The chief emotion in this picture is Pathos. A little of the dramatic music will be needed and a few misteriosos and agitato can readily be used. For a general presentation play selections from Manon.

MILLION DOLLAR DOLLIES (Screen Classics Production—Five Reels)—Theme—Allegretto. Suggest "Canzmetto"—D'Ambrosio, "Chanson Sans Parole"—Tschaikowsky, or "Spring Song"—Mendelssohn.

This picture is a brillante extravaganse requiring light treatment. Note the act shown at the Palace theatre, consisting of four numbers, a one-step, waltz, fox-trot and Oriental dance. Immediately following this scene the atmosphere changes to Oriental and continues so until the end of the picture. Cue sheets may be obtained from the Metro Exchange.

OLD WIVES FOR NEW (Paramount—Six Reels)—Theme unnecessary. The atmosphere is American and Venetian. In the main the picture is light and lacks the element of melodrama. No hurrys or agitato are needed. In the fourth reel the Victrola plays "You're Here and I'm Here." During this scene a fight between two girls take place ending with a shooting. At the end of the scene a flash of Victrola grinding out "You're Here and I'm Here." This should be handled very deftly—following the picture closely, graduating from pp to ff; an agitato during the fight and at the close of the scene an imitation of the Victrola run down, producing that scratching effect. This is very important. Cue sheet may be obtained from the Paramount Exchange.

RESURRECTION (Paramount—Five Reels)—Theme—Andantino. Suggest "Momeuts Musical"—Moskowsky, "Serenade"—Tschaikowsky, or "Cradle Song"—Tschaikowsky.

This is a picture of Russian atmosphere through the entire production, and to obtain a good musical accompaniment it is absolutely necessary to play as much Russian music as possible. Watch closely where the religious selection appears and play up to the last flash, making a big and glorious finish. The following numbers are needed in this picture:

- "Largo," MaestosoHaendel
- "Serenade," Tempo di Valse.....Rachmaninoff
- "Solonelle March," MaestosoTschaikowsky
- "Andante Cantabile," from 5th Symphony.....Tschaikowsky
- "Hymn of New Russia".....Gretchininoff
- "Valse Triste," LentoSibelius
- "Largo," from New World Symphony.....Dvorak
- "Song of the Boatman of the Volga".....Cady
- "Prelude," ModeratoRachmaninoff
- "In the Steppe," Moderato.....Gretchininoff

Close the picture with the "Hymn of New Russia." Cut sheet may be obtained from Paramount Exchange.

ROSE O' PARADISE (Paralta—Six Reels)—Theme—Moderato Violin Solo. Suggest Allegretto from the Violin Sonata—Grieg.

The opening is intensely agitato and continues till the story proper begins. Then light music for the first three reels. The last three are dramatic and need heavy treatment. The continuity is excellent and there are few flash-backs to confuse the leader. Use long numbers in every instance. Close with the theme. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paralta Exchange.

SOCIAL BRIARS (Mutual—Five Reels)—Theme—Andantino. Suggest Love Song—Flegler, Consolation—Liszt, or Melody—Lederer.

Church hymns are needed throughout this picture and we suggest the following:

- D. When children sing—Precious Jewels.
- D. Jim and Mrs. Kane praying—Rock of Ages.
- D. Interior—Jim and Mrs. Kane—Nearer My God to Thee.
- T. But the great city—Organ voluntary.
- D. Choir singing—Come Ye Disconsolate.
- T. Rehearsal—Te Deum.

There is also opportunity for using Love's Old Sweet Song. He's a Jolly Good Fellow and When You and I Were Young, Maggie. Cue sheets may be obtained from the Mutual Exchange.

TEMPERED STEEL (First National Exhibitors' Circuit, Inc.—Five Reels)—Theme—Andantino. Suggest Reverie—Corelli, Heart's Desire—Losey, or A Little Song—Erdody.

This picture is largely dramatic, with locations in the South and New York City. The opening should be characteristically Southern. Note the direct cue for My Old Kentucky Home. Cue sheets may be obtained from First National Exhibitors' Circuit, Inc.

TOYS OF FATE (Screen Classics, Inc.—Six Reels)—Theme—Andante and Gypsy. Theme must be violin solo to do the picture justice. Suggest Second Nocturne—Chopin.

The picture deals with gypsy life interwoven with society, and wonderful results can be obtained by changing from one to the other at the proper moment. You will need some gypsy dance music, and many excerpts from Carmen will fit nicely. The last three reels are intensely dramatic and big stuff is required. Note the pistol shot towards the last reel. Disregard the violin solo at the last and play some pleasing melody to show the happy ending.

TRAIL TO YESTERDAY (Metro—Six Reels)—Theme—Moderato. Suggest Yester Love—Borch, My Paradise—Zamecnik, or Gardenia—Densmore.

This is a Western drama abounding in big scenes of violence and pathos. Note the direct cue—D. When Sheila takes guitar play Silver Threads Among the Gold. Use guitar effect by using pizzicato strings if possible. Cue sheets may be obtained from the Metro Exchange.

TRIUMPH OF THE WEAK (Vitagraph—Five Reels)—Theme—Andantino. Suggest Extase D'Amour—Roze, Moonbeams—Kelsner, or Salut D'Amour—Elgar.

Pathos is the keynote to this feature and sob stuff should prevail. Dramatics, a few agitato and misteriosos will be needed also. Cue sheets may be obtained from the Vitagraph Exchange.

Leaders' Service Bureau.

Questions Answered—Suggestions Offered.

Q. Do you consider it necessary to have music between the hours of five and seven? I have been using pianist during these hours, but the receipts are so small that they do not cover relief pianist's salary. It seems my patrons could be notified of the fact that there will be no music between the hours of five to seven and not expect it. What do you think?

A. We regard the notifying of your patrons that there will be no music at the supper hour as very poor business. Your show should be kept up to standard at all hours and the overhead charges should not be charged to that hour. Music should be your big feature, and a good pianist can handle the show nicely during the off hours without letting down in your standard of efficiency. By no means allow your people to consider that you are classing your theater as a cheap house.

Q. What is your opinion of an electric piano as a ballyhoo in the lobby?

A. You are not running a circus and there seems to be no need of a clap-trap caliope to notify the townspeople that you are in business. The money that you would spend could be put to greater advantage by using it in a dignified form of advertising. The picture industry is too well founded to require such bizarre methods of exploitation.

Q. Sometime ago there appeared a question in your Leader's Service Bureau regarding jazz music. I've heard quite a number of jazz orchestras and the music sounds much like scrambled hash. Are the orchestrations written as the music sounds, or do the players fake in most of the wind notes?

A. Jazz music is generally played by players that have little experience in the better class of music, and they are inclined to fake a considerable portion of it. Jazz really means go-as-you-please and make all the noise you can.

Q. Where can I get a good flute and piccolo player?

A. If it be a union player that you want apply to the union local in your town. If a non-union player is required we can furnish you with a list of names and addresses and you can communicate directly with them.

Q. Have the pictures at the cantonments orchestras, and do they supply outside musicians or only those connected with the army?

A. The orchestras are made up entirely from the ranks of the army or navy. No outsider has any opportunity of playing with these musicians.

Q. What do you think of illustrated song slides? Do you think they will ever come back as an attraction in moving picture theaters?

A. Illustrated song slides are distinctly passe, and you would be foolish to attempt their use. The songs of today are put into moving pictures showing the story of the music and are used by many exhibitors with some success. A good singer is always an attraction, and this new idea is sure to meet with some approval from your patrons, but be sure of your singer.

Q. In playing the Trio in a march don't you think it more effective to "soften down" the first time then come out full in the repeat?

A. That is the usual way to play the Trio, but it largely depends upon your interpretation and the effect that you wish to convey.

Q. What are the literal meanings of D. C. and D. S. Of course I know what these indicate, but do not know their literal definitions.

A. D. C. is an abbreviation of the Italian words Da Capo, which means from the beginning, while D. S. (Dal Segno) means from the sign. G. Schirmer has issued a pocket manual of musical terms by Dr. Theodore Baker that will meet your every need in the derivation of technical words.

Q. "Is it true that Puccini's music cannot be played for pictures without paying royalty?"

A. "Puccini and his managers, Ricordi Brothers, regard the playing of an operatic selection to the picturization of a play which the composer has written with operatic form as a production of the opera. If you play Madame Butterfly music to the picture called Madame Butterfly you must pay royalties for so doing. It is an infringement of performing rights. They cannot prevent you playing any part of the opera as a separate selection."

Q. Will you please give me a list of some of the bigger overtures suitable for pictures?

- A. The following list we believe will be a splendid addition to your library:
- AthaliaMendelssohn
- Adagio LamentosoTschaikowsky
- Down SouthMyddleton
- EgmoutBeethoven
- FreischutzVon Weber
- Fifth NocturneLeybach
- Il GuaranyGomez

Musical Directors.

THE duties of a musical director become more arduous as the demands for better music become more exacting. More and more of his time must be devoted to his musical settings. Hours must be devoted to research work to properly fit some peculiar situation arising in the picture for the following day or week. It may be just possible that because he cannot find the necessary theme he will be forced to arrange it from his memory. In the larger houses where they have a regular librarian the work is lightened somewhat, but in any case the musical director has little time for conducting after he gets his show in running order. He has become a man-of-affairs in the strictest sense of the word and his position is one of dignity and importance, ranking favorably with that of any successful executive of Big Business.

No workman or professional man can show results without good tools. A large library is the one large asset of the successful leader or director. It must be properly classified according to his individual needs, so that time is saved in selection. The peculiarity of a library is the fact that it must be personally selected in the first place to be of real value to the director in his picture work. A library bought off-band and installed in a theater expressly for the use of a leader has but one advantage in that it saves him looking over the music in a publisher's salesroom. He must, however, familiarize himself with every number before he knows what atmosphere it holds and of what use he can make of it. Taking chances on what some one else has classified would prove disastrous in the extreme, because of the wide range and latitude found in musical interpretation.

The musical department of the motion picture industry has never received its proper mead of praise and recognition, largely because the attention of the producers has not been called to the necessary qualifications requisite in a good musical director, and partly because of the general ignorance prevailing about the art of music in the lay mind. It is popularly supposed that any one who can play a violin, piano, or organ, can take charge of the music in a picture house and render excellent service in the fitting of pictures. One might just as well say that every carpenter can be a contractor, or every plowman become a successful farmer. A carpenter may some day become a contractor, providing he possesses the other necessary qualifications, and the plowman has the chance of owning his farm if his ambition and initiative be strong enough. A general should come from the ranks, but every soldier would not make a good general. So it is with music. A player may be a virtuoso as such, but would fall utterly as a musical director, especially if he were called upon to fit pictures, while at the same time there are many musical directors who are not and never have been wonderful players.

A musical director must first of all be a good general, with a firm control over his men, but beloved by them for his ability and good fellowship. Commanding an orchestra through the principle of fear never speaks for the highest form of excellence in their playing, while good fellowship alone is not conducive to good playing. A leader must command the respect of his men, assert his authority while in the pit, but be one of them during rest periods or on the street. At no time should players be treated like dogs. Leaders who get the best results from their orchestras are those who show a little appreciation of their efforts and occasionally pass the word of praise. This tact is born in one and is probably the greatest of all the necessary attributes of a good leader.

Besides being able to handle men to the greatest advantage a director in charge of a picture theater must have a wide knowledge of picture values. He should know considerable of the technique of picture making. His knowledge of the dramatic values should be wide, not those gleaned from the blood-and-thunder ten, twenty and thirty. He must be capable of true perception of plot development and accurately gauge his music to lead up to the climax lest his musical climax precede that of the picture and rob the feature of its merit. It is sometimes a difficult matter to judge the proper situation to fit when the action is fast and kaleidoscopic. In fact, sometimes judgment fails and intuition must be relied upon entirely. A great director will mark, musically, his atmosphere, as accurately as his tempo. This means much because it further enhances the entertainment quality of the picture. It takes the audience out of themselves as the producer intended it should.

Music values must be thoroughly understood by the competent director. The old way of fitting pictures simply meant that if a pathetic number were required the leader would search out a slow andante of a pathetic nature and use it, disregarding other conditions altogether. Recently we heard the "Song of the Boatmen of the Volga" played slowly as a pathetic number during a sad scene, the location of which was in Belgium. There was nothing Russian in the situation and certainly no boatmen in sight. From the standpoint of melody and harmony, the selection, as played, suited the situation, and musically illiterate people would have pronounced it a fitting selection. Nevertheless, it showed poor judgment. This song is as Russian as "Dixie" is American. It is well known and carries with it but one interpretation, the idea of which is far removed from the dominant emotion which was found in this scene.

A musical director must study his audience. He must give them the musical tit-bits that their hearts crave if it is possible to do so without marring his presentation. Every theater clientele differs in its musical tastes, and as the first principle of business is to make moey, that clientele must be catered to. Great leaders quickly find out the desires of their patrons and instantly win favor and applause by gratifying them. Mistakes in correctly judging his audience have lost the position of many a leader.

The time has arrived when a musical director must do more than play or conduct. He must read widely the trade journals. He must familiarize himself with what pictures are being produced and when they are to be released. He must keep up with the times in the matter of orchestra scores and special presentations. He must learn what the other and bigger fellow is doing. He should note what new music is available for picture purposes, and, above all, he should visit other cities and other picture theaters for new ideas relating to picture presentation. The wise exhibitor will gladly furnish the expenses incidental to such a foraging expedition. Wise theater managers should insist upon their leader taking the time necessary for research and review work. Nothing can bring the theater better returns in dollars and cents. In fact, it is senseless, under present keen competition, to do anything else.

Summing up, we find that a good director of music in the picture theater must have a wide knowledge of pictures and men, a keen insight and instinct for dramatic and music values, a powerful perception of the desires of his patrons and a devotion to his work and employer that will call forth his best efforts in continually bettering his show.

"The Sister of Rosie O'Grady."

This is not the name of a book, nor an Irish comedy. It is a song that goes with the Goldwyn picture, "The Venus Model."

It is intensely gratifying to watch the new moves on the picture-music chessboard. Each advance is strengthening the game, and from our observation on the sidelines it looks like a won game for music.

Coincident with the release of this song, exhibitors throughout the United States have arranged to use the song covers for lobby displays, to have the soloists use the number, and also to have their orchestras play it throughout the week of the release of "The Venus Model." In addition hundreds of exhibitors have arranged to have music tables in their lobbies and sell the song to their patrons.

We do not believe that such a reputable firm as Goldwyn would use a picture to exploit a song for monetary gain. Goldwyn is in the business of making and distributing pictures, so that the only reasonable conclusion to be drawn is that they have seen the light. Music makes pictures just as emphatically as a camera makes them, but in a different way. Let the good work proceed.

Music for "Pershing's Crusaders" at the Lyric.

The regular Lyric Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Arundel, provides a splendid musical accompaniment to "Pershing's Crusaders."

The picture is largely educational in its aim and purpose, which makes it difficult to fit music of sufficient variety to hold the ear, but throughout the entire seven reels your thoughts are with the brave boys who have rushed into the breach to fight for democracy. Speaking of democracy, the music truly portrays that feeling and ideal "Chin Chin Cbinaman," "Onward Christian Soldiers," "By the Suwanee River," "Semper Fidelis," "Marseillaise," "Zampa Overture" and "American Melodies."

Picture fitting, owing to the elasticity of musical art and the wide latitude allowed musical interpretation, is a subject that presents many difficulties in criticizing. However, there are some fundamental principles that must be adhered to in order that the greatest good can be received from the music, and there are some well defined rules regarding misfit music that are understood by layman and musician. "American Patrol," used where the American boys are in the trenches, is not the best possible selection. "Ballroom Chatter" and "Where Do We Go from Here" have no place in the setting, especially the latter, which carries through it the strain of "Hail, Hail, the Gang's All Here." Why lower the dignity of the picture in this way? Another selection that jarred upon us was the use of Chopin Funeral March in a scene of the Kaiser reviewing a squad of troops. The idea behind the selection was excellent. We all desire his death, and speedily, but instead of impressing the audience seriously, it creates a laugh that is decidedly out of place at the moment. The cleverness shown in selection will never overcome the burlesque possibilities.

Mr. Arundel handles his orchestra in a quiet, gentlemanly way, and gets good results therefrom. His playing of the sub-titles PP is highly commendable and the music becomes a real accompaniment to the action.

Musical Suggestion Synopsis.

AT THE MERCY OF MEN (Select—Five Reels)—Theme—Andante. Suggest Ilawk's Dramatic—Ilawk, L'Arlesleime—Bizet, or Meditation—Delmas.

This picture is dramatic and needs big stuff. Many agitados, misteriosos and hurrys will fill the gaps and fit the action. Cue sheets may be obtained from the Select exchange.

A MODEL'S CONFESSION (Universal—Six Reels)—Theme—Allegretto. Suggest Why Don't You—Caldwell, Serenata—Cajani, or A Spring Morn—Morris.

Light music will fit this picture nicely. "Just a Little Love," by Silesu; "Japanese Reverie," by Bartlett, and "Egmont Overture" are numbers that can be used to great advantage. Cue sheets may be obtained from the Universal exchange.

BRAVE AND BOLD (Fox—Five Reels)—Theme—Andante. Suggest Ariso—Prey, Meditation—Leigh, or Nocturne—Karganoff.

There will be needed for this picture a slow misterioso, two furiosos, a few agitados and a galop. Use "Hello Frisco" if possible and "We Won't Go Home Till Morning." Cue sheets may be obtained from the Fox exchange.

$5,000 REWARD (Bluebird—Four Reels)—Theme—Valse Lento. Suggest Eileen Asthore, from Victor Herbert's "Eileen," or Miss Molly May, by Edwards.

Stirring adventures are depicted in this little feature. Use big stuff. Have a few misteriosos, hurrys, agitados, and dramatic tensions ready. Cue sheets may be obtained from the Universal exchange.

GOLDEN GOAL, THE (Vitagraph—Five Reels)—Theme—Moderato. Suggest Purity—Borch, Adieu—Karanoff, or Elysian Dreams—Rendland.

This is a dramatic and requires big treatment. At "T. (?) One of those seaman's mission," use the hymn, "Throw Out the Life-line," on the organ if possible. Cue sheets may be obtained from the Vitagraph exchange.

MYSTERIOUS CLIENT, THE (Pathe—Five Reels)—Theme—Andantino. Suggest Premier D'Amour—Benoist, Astarte—Mildenberg, or Over the Waters—Hoffman.

This picture is a melodrama filled with dramatic action requiring dramatic music. There is a bit of Italian-American atmosphere which can be well taken care of by the use of some well known Italian folk song. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Pathe exchange.

OLDEST LAW, THE (World—Five Reels)—Theme—Andantino. Suggest Mountain Music Song—Borch, Moonbeams—Keiser, or Salut D'Amour—Elgar.

This picture is dramatic, with many Maine woods' exteriors which can be well fitted by pastorales. Although the picture is dramatic there will be no need for heavy music. Use melodious stuff of an andante or slow nature. Cue sheets can be obtained from the World exchange.

PRUNELLA (Paramount—Five Reels)—Theme—Valse Lente. Suggest Maytime—Romberg, or Girl from Brazil—Romberg.

The story is somewhat light, and as you have played Marguerite Clark many times before you can readily guess the class of music which will fit her light heartedness. There is little chance for dramatic stuff, and no opportunity for hurrys, agitados or misteriosos. In the third reel a semi-misterioso might be used at the "T. That Night," but it must be very light. Choose dainty music as far as possible. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paramount exchange.

SHACKLED (Paralta Plays—Six Reels)—Theme—Moderato and Dramatic. Suggest Nocturne No. 2—Chopin, Melodic—Friedl, or Serenade—Chaminade.

Nothing is found in this picture but drama, with the exception of a few light touches, which are short. There is a place for the "Wedding March" played briskly, "Home Sweet Home," and close with "Song of Songs," by De Moya. Cue sheets may be obtained from the Hodkinson Distributing Corporation.

Questions Answered—Suggestions Offered.

Q. What are harmonics on the violin, and how are they produced, and what is their scientific cause?

A. One of the series of tones which usually accompany, more or less faintly, the primo tone produced by a string, an organ pipe, the human voice, etc. The primo tone is the strong tone produced by the vibration of the whole string, or the entire column of air in the pipe; the partial tones are produced by the vibration of fractional parts of that string or air or air column. These same harmonics are obtained on any stringed instrument which is stopped by lightly touching a nodal point of a string.

Q. Now that the French Society of Composers is to follow the lead of the American society in imposing a music tax on picture houses, is it not most likely that the Italian, Russian, and other foreign societies, will attempt to do likewise? There's danger ahead! Unless there is a check to this movement the exhibitor will be forced to employ his own composer or disband his orchestra. Can you throw any additional light on the situation?

A. The Italian society is already in the field as a part of the American. Russia is not likely to enter for a long while, and so far as any danger is concerned, it would be absurd to consider it in that light. What the exhibitor must fight for is a more equitable method of collecting royalties as no one questions the duty involved in the principle.

Q. I am desirous of obtaining a novel and freak effect. Do you think an orchestra made up entirely of red-headed musicians would produce a soft amber light in the orchestra pit if direct light rays were projected upon their heads?

A. If your likes run to red-heads, by all means get them. But as you are not running a circus or side-show why collect monstrosities.

Q. Do the makers of player-pianos and automatic organs produce pictures scores in roll music form?

A. So far there has been no way discovered to make the idea practical, owing to the fact of the altered footage in a feature as it goes from theater to theater. Some day, when they invent unbreakable film, all these things will be possible.

Q. Are there such things as glass "wind" instruments? I should think glass would produce much sweeter tones than brass. And, too, the player would always be able to see the notes he was making, provided the instrument was of transparent glass. Cut glass should produce clean-cut tones.

A. This question does not fall within our jurisdiction and we refer you to your nearest jeweler.

Q. There are several scales in music which we all know, such as melodic, harmonic, etc. Is there such a scale as a major-minor scale?

A. The following definitions of major and minor scales will preclude any further misunderstanding on this subject: A major scale is one composed of five full tone and two semi-tones, the latter falling between three and four and seven and eight. A minor scale is one composed of four whole tones, two semi-tones, and a tone and a half, and the semi-tones falling in between two and three and seven and eight while the augmented second lies between six and seven.

Q. Kindly give me an idea of how to arrange my orchestra on the stage. We have just moved from our old theater across the street into a house that was formerly used for the legitimate drama and the stage is very large. I only have a small orchestra of ten pieces with piano. Is it advisable to put the piano on the stage with the orchestra?

A. We must answer your last question first in order to arrive at a reasonable result. If your piano is an upright it will obstruct the view of your screen when placed on the stage or it will be misplaced if used on either side of the orchestra. We would advise you to exchange it for a grand piano and place the same up stage and a little to the left, with the keyboard hidden from the audience. This will give the pianist an unobstructed view of the leader and at the same time allow him to play to the picture if necessary. With regard to your orchestra we would suggest that you add two more first violins and arrange to have your leader conduct with the baton, as it makes the music more impressive. The strings should be on the left of the leader and the wood-wind and brass on the right, the drums being on the extreme right. By the use of palms and other flowers placed about the stage you can make a very good showing even with such a small combination.

Q. I am a leader in a house changing pictures every day and I depend a great deal upon cue sheets. There is no similarity in the various cue sheets that I get and it is difficult in many cases to read them. Can you help me?

A. We are not in a position to suggest any relief at the present, but your problem is one that has appealed to us, and upon which we have had many complaints. This department is making every effort to force a standardization of all cue sheets, and we hope that the time is not far distant when the petty jealousies of carping caddishness will give place to a broader outlook among the various cue sheet arrangers.

Q. What can I do to overcome the nuisance of "substitutes" in my orchestra?

A. In a small town like the one in which you work it is almost impossible to avoid the "substitute" habit. No doubt you have the cream of the players in your orchestra and any society event means new faces to play the picture. You dare not lay down the law and force your men to stop the practice, as it would probably be your undoing as a leader. We believe a serious talk to the "boys" would have its effect if you used tact and clearly defined your reasons for requesting that they devote their entire time to you.

Mr. Rothapfel's Right-Hand Man.

WE found the delightful Doctor Riesenfeld, musical director of those twin monuments to the picture industry, the Rialto and the Rivoli, seated at an ordinary business desk and looking for all the world like a broker or some magnate of finance. Yet there was a difference in his surroundings that breathed of the finer arts. A vase of flowers stood conspicuously in the center of the desk obstructing our view of the doctor's classic profile, and we proceeded to remove the flowers. Manuscript music lay carelessly about the top, and a toy metronome of beautiful workmanship spoke eloquently of his profession.

Looking about his neat little studio-office one found paintings in oil (not imitations, but original work), a few shelves of books treating of many phases of musical endeavor, some exquisite charcoal drawings, one or two photographs, and the musician's ever reliable tool, a piano. The fine taste displayed in the furniture scheme makes this little den, hidden away as it is, on one of the upper floors of the Rialto, most cozy and homelike. Nothing offends the eye or jars the ear. The atmosphere soothes and pleases. In fact the temptation to remain in these pleasant surroundings requires strength of will to resist.

"Has the advance in picture music kept pace with the advance in picture making?" we asked the genial Hugo.

"I have little chance to see what the other theaters are doing, but, speaking for myself and the work which we are accomplishing here, I can assure you that we are taking more pains, exerting more effort, and considering more detail than we formerly did; say, two years ago. Music for the picture has become one of the outstanding features in presenting features to the public. The novelty of the 'movies' has worn off, and our patrons demand more than 'just pictures.' At the same time we always give the picture first place. Never do we allow our music to predominate over the picture situations. Never do we permit the melodies to transcend the scenes. Our music must fittingly accompany the picture just as one would accompany the voice. Another point in which we have progressed is in treating the psychological aspect of the picture. Formerly this side was utterly ignored, and for that reason the picture lost much of its musical meaning. We look beneath the surface and get at the underlying motive of each scene. Mere titles don't tell us the story. We analyze the action and place the scenes in their definite position with regard to the climax of the plot."

The earnestness which he put into his discourse theme lit up and almost transfigured his face. No one seeing him expounding his theory could possibly doubt his sincerity and strong love for his work.

"The ideal accompaniment for pictures," he continued, "would be an orchestra where the brass instruments were absent. Because of the monotony of the strings and woodwind it would be necessary to replace the brass with a new kind of instrument—a smaller trumpet with less volume, trombones of a smaller size, and so forth. The color should be the same, but the blare should be eradicated and the volume diminished. No matter how piano the brass section play it overbalances the orchestra to a certain extent."

This is decidedly a new idea, and as America is the home of invention there is no doubt that the day will arrive—if the need becomes strong—when picture theaters will have orchestras composed of different and new instruments. There is no question that the brass section as now found in symphony orchestras does not exactly fill the bill for pictures. The coloring is too decided, too well defined and clear cut to allow much beauty of shading.

"What constitutes a good conductor for pictures?" we asked.

"First let me say that showmanship has nothing to do with conductorship. It is said of Raphael that had he been bereft of hands he still would have been a great painter. The same holds with a conductor. His graceful gestures and good stage presence are not the attributes that make him a great leader. A good conductor for pictures is one that is a thorough musician—he cannot be too thorough—who forgets what he has learned, disregards all markings, and reads his score in the picture. He must play to screen action, and his dynamic effects must coincide with those on the film. Of course this does not hold when a special score has been written for the picture, because the composer places his markings and expects that they will be adhered to. But when you must fit your picture with music that has its own interpretation and which must be changed to suit yours, one is forced to transgress many of the rules of good musicianship."

Mr. Riesenfeld is extremely conscientious and is continually at war with himself on the subject of picture setting. His inherent sense of the artistic and his reverence for the great works of the masters rebel within him when he is forced to distort their music to fit a scene adequately. He is not the self-satisfied person that you would expect.

"Frequently, after spending many hours on a setting, I go away disgusted with the result of my efforts. It is not an unusual thing for my librarian to receive an early telephone call the morning following our completion of a score and be requested to change certain numbers therein. A good night's sleep clarifies one's vision, and I always find that the changes of the 'morning after' bring good results."

Mr. Riesenfeld compares the screen to opera without singing. His twenty years of grand opera experience has stood him in good stead. Frequently a scene recalls one similar in an opera of earlier days, and gives him his cue for proper musical interpretation of it. Of course, when he must fit pictures which are based on the stories of certain grand operas, he is at home, and the difficulties become very slight. Even while selecting numbers for light pictures his experience in comic opera can be drawn upon with telling effect. There is no question about it. A real conductor must be one of wide musical experience because of the wide scope of the picture industry today. Nothing is sacred to the film manufacturer if it will give him a good story that has in it a drawing capacity for box office receipts.

Our host kindly showed us the immense library of music which the Rialto and Rivoli use in putting together their respective weekly programs. The music is neatly arranged upon shelves and duly catalogued under characteristic names in alphabetical order. Two large rooms are needed to hold it all, and a librarian with two assistants is kept busy filing and setting up the music. There is nothing intricate about the system used in this library, for it follows along the usual method of tabulation. Conforming to the exacting demand for detail of S. L. Rothapfel, the managing director of both houses, necessitates the special arranging of many numbers that are out of print or for some reason cannot be procured for use. This has added to the library a large collection of almost invaluable stuff that can be used over and over again without fear of repetition. Besides this asset there are many original compositions by Mr. Riesenfeld called forth by some delicate or peculiar situation in a particular feature that in themselves are works of art and real value. Altogether, we were much impressed with this library, its methodical working and its magnitude, and left feeling that the high standard of efficiency in the musical department could be credited to that careful, clean, and clear-cut brain of born artist, Doctor Hugo Riesenfeld.

Music At the Rivoli.

During the week commencing May 19, the Rivoli theater offered a superb program of music. The Rivoli Symphony orchestra is gradually rounding into form, and is becoming a cohesive aggregation that will set a mark for itself in the near future. It takes a few weeks' practice for any large sized combination to get together and perform smoothly. Then the artistic touches can be brought out without fear of stumbling.

The overture, "Mignon," by Ambrose Thomas, was conducted by Erno Rapee in a manner which delighted us indeed. This is the best work we have had the pleasure of seeing Mr. Rapee do. He is improving immensely, and the older leaders will have to look to their laurels if his advance in the art continues. We sincerely hope that our prediction is more than fulfilled.

A pretty little divertissement was the "Minuet L'Antique" danced by two little ladies from the Albertieri Ballet School. The setting was especially effective, and the accompaniment from behind stage consisting of a harp, flute and cello made the offering one which you could only associate with fairy land. These little touches are the things that make for true entertainment of a highly artistic nature. They rest the eye and brain while pleasing them both.

The setting for "Old Wives for New" compared favorably with the high standard already set by this house. The idea of telling musically the characters behind the different sets of bands as they are exposed to view showed a careful consideration, and fulfilled its mission to the uttermost. We knew the principals by what the music told us about their hands. This psychological point of view is well worth some thought, as it no doubt will have a stronger bearing on music for the pictures in the future. One thing that pleased us was the fact that when a title, "Home, Sweet Home," appeared the orchestra did NOT play the old familiar ballad bearing the same name. We feel that a more marked change of music to denote the change of location in the last reel would have been effective. Italy is so different in its atmosphere from America, and a sharp musical accentuation of this fact would make the story live.

Winnifred Marshall, a light lyric soprano, attempted "The Shadow Song," from Dinorah. The voice is pleasing, and, with the possible tendency for falling away from the true pitch, has wonderful technical ability. The aria was a little beyond the voice capability because of its immaturity. The foundation is there, and with years will come the necessary warmth of tone and breadth of timbre bespeaking success.

The comedy and organ solo closed one of the most satisfactory shows put on at the Rivoli.

French Music.

This war will make many changes in business, and the selling of music will, of necessity, undergo a radical one. The feeling against all that emanates from Germany or springs from the creative mind of its people will surely find expression in the field of music, and that expression will probably take the form of a distinct boycott. The progressive German and propagandist has done his work well in keeping German music in the foreground through every branch of the art. The best known songs come from Germany, the familiar operas are the German, the majority of programmed chamber music shows a large percentage of the German school, while in the orchestral and symphonic field we find practically the same majority.

The old masters of classics such as Johann Sebastian Bach, Beethoven, Mendelssohn and Liszt will probably always be welcomed on the ground that though born in Germany they are international in their musical appeal. The few scholarly musicians who sufficiently antedate the war to remove the stigma of Hunnishness reduce the available music from this otherwise prolific source to a few hundred selections. The demand for good music grows greater continually, and the loss must be more than made up from other sources.

The French Society of Authors, Composers and Publishers keenly appreciates the chance of furthering the French school of music in America, and has sent Oscar Osso to thoroughly organize a branch office in New York to distribute the works of the thousands of French composers so little known in our land. The aim of the society is most laudable, and the method as outlined by Mr. Osso will commend itself to the general public.

"It is not our intention to burden the places of entertainment with heavy taxation for the performance rights to French music. That is, after all, a secondary consideration. We are here to educate the American public to the fact that there is a wealth of melodious and beautiful music which they have never heard, but which stands pre-eminently worthy of execution. Our ultimate plan embodies the idea of a chain of depots owned and operated by us where French music of all descriptions can be procured at a reasonable price. We are handicapped at present because of the poor transportation facilities, and find it difficult to obtain any quantity of saleable music. This condition will soon be remedied, and we will be in a position to supply all branches of the musical art with the best that France can offer.

"Regarding the taxing of theaters and other places of amusement for playing our copyrighted numbers we can only state that it is our intention to deal fairly by everybody. We want the American people to love our music, and the matter of a few dollars will not blind us to our first principle. Your picture theaters will receive special consideration, because we believe that they hold wonderful possibilities in the education of the masses to the better class of musical works. Whatever tax or fee we apportion to these places will be based upon an equitable principle that cannot fail to meet with hearty co-operation.

"Our entrance into the field will be most beneficial to places of amusement that provide music. The French people are proverbially gay and light hearted, and this shows strongly in the music of the nation. Competition is the life of trade, and when we begin to operate our influence should be felt in the reduction of fees already imposed by other societies. It will give the exhibitor a chance for choice in his music and not bind him to arbitrary taxes. We want your exhibitor to feel our friendship and realize that our hand is outstretched to help him in his musical needs."

Mr. Osso fully appreciates the fact that American exhibitors have not heretofore paid for the privilege of performing copyrighted music and thoroughly understands the difficulties that confront him in this new rule. He does not flaunt the law in our faces, but approaches us from the standpoint of our duty to the composer. We profit by his music, why not pay an insignificantly small sum to show our appreciation in tangible form. The French society has the benefit of the mistakes made by others, and should profit therefrom. The sense of justice seems to predominate over everything else in its propaganda, and we feel sure that if it plans carefully and acts with discretion the French Society of Authors, Composers and Publishers will become the real friend of the picture exhibitor.

Music in Public Parks.

Seattle, Washington, has for a number of years enjoyed public park concerts during the open season. An annual appropriation of $5,000 was made to pay for these concerts. One of the city fathers succeeding in blocking this appropriation this year on the ground of war economy. This action almost resulted in real war. The whole town, except that class of Pharisees who think any kind of pleasure, even good music, is sinful, protested. The Central Labor Council entered the most vigorous protest.

"Cheerfulness as usual," a fit sister to the slogan; "business as usual," with which this country was kept from the hysteria in the first dark days of war, was the desire expressed by the Central Labor Council in passing a resolution urging the park board and Mayor Hanson to reconsider action cutting off the annual appropriation of $5,000 for music in the parks, inferring that this city is fearful of defeat at the hands of the Kaiser and creating an atmosphere of gloom when the extreme reverse should be the order of the day. The resolution was forwarded by the moving picture operators, endorsed by the council, and the municipal affairs committee of the council instructed to convey the request to the mayor and park board.

This is practically the first instance upon record where the interests of the musician and picture operator coincided. Great credit is due the picture theater orchestras for their strenuous work in furthering a measure that they could not personally gain by, but which they fully appreciated as an advance in the art of music.

Musical Suggestion Synopsis.

A DAUGHTER OF THE WEST (Pathe—Five Reels)—Theme—Andante and Melodious. Suggest "Arioso"—Frey, "Clairs de Lune"—Thome, or "The Herd Girl's Dream"—Labitisky.

The picture is full of action, and of a dramatic nature. The atmosphere is Western, requiring many galops, a few hurrys, a misterioso, and a couple of big dramatic overtures in the last part. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Pathe exchange.

A ROMANCE OF THE UNDERWORLD (Keeney—Five Reels)—Theme—Andantino. Suggest "The Sunshine of Your Smile"—Ray, or "Extase D'Amour"—Roze.

The title indicates the nature and atmosphere of this picture. There is a strong love sentiment running throughout it. Such numbers as "East Side, West Side," or "Old Timers," by Lake, will be found useful. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Frank A. Keeney Corporation.

BAREE, SON OF KAZAN (Vitagraph—Five Reels)—Theme for Wolf Dog—Allegretto. Suggest "Babilage"—Castillo, "The Magpie and the Parrot"—Bendix, or "Twilight"—Cesek.

The atmosphere is that of a great Northwest. Animal life is shown, and there is great opportunity for pastorelle music. At "T. Lerue, the One Who Cared," you will need some American Indian stuff, and it would be well to note the sleigh bell effects throughout the picture. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Vitagraph exchange.

DANGER WITHIN (Bluebird—Five Reels)—Theme—Tempo di Valse. Suggest "Valse Poupee"—Podini, "Love Is Like a Firefly"—Friml, or "Valse Poudre"—Poppy.

This feature requires light treatment, and nothing of a heavy nature is needed until the last two reels. Use "Erl King"—Schubert, a galop, an agitato, a fox-trot, and close with the theme. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Vitagraph exchange.

DOLLY DOES HER BIT (Pathe—Five Reels)—Theme unnecessary. Open with "School Days," by Edwards, followed by a light polka, light stuff till darky boy dances, then use a genuine of nigger hoe-down. During the scenes showing the automatic doll use the "Dance of Marionettes." A few misteriosos and agitados are also needed. Catch auto truck and silverware falling. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Pathe exchange.

GUILT OF SILENCE (Bluebird—Five Reels)—Theme—Moderato. Suggest "By the Banks of the Saskatchewan"—Caryll, "At the Hamlet"—Godard, or "New Mowu Hay"—Mathews.

This is a Canadian story. Lots of pastorelle music is needed with a little that is dramatic. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Universal exchange.

INTERLOPER, The (World—Five Reels)—Theme—Andante Sostenuto. Suggest "For All Eternity"—Mascheronie, "Wedding Morn"—Luscomb, or "Twilight"—Ayer.

This picture has two locations, one in the South, and the other in New York City. Make the change of atmosphere distinct and well defined by your musical selection. There is some dramatic emotion, but the picture is a bit light throughout. Open with "Dixie," and vote the violin solo when musician sits at piano. Use a ballad for the singer who follows. Cue sheets can be obtained from the World exchange.

LONELY WOMAN, THE (Triangle—Five Reels)—Theme—Andante Dramatic. Suggest "Love Song"—Flegler, "Love Song"—Nevin, or "Elysium"—Speaks.

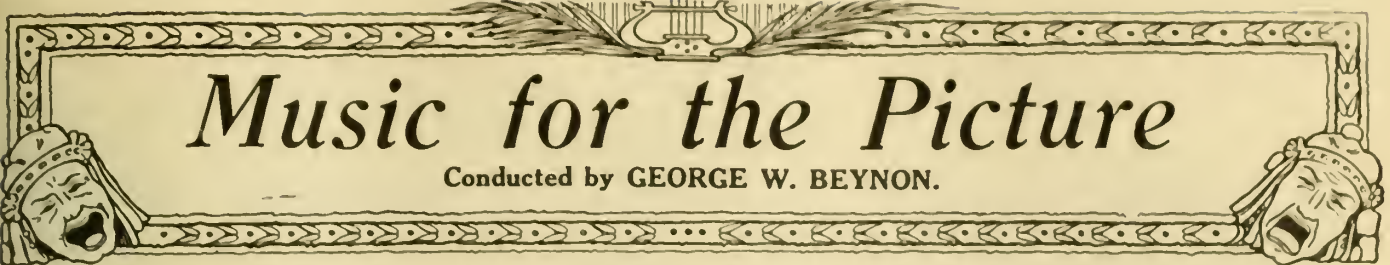

You will need pathetic music for this picture, a few dramatic tensions, and a considerable quantity of big stuff. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Triangle exchange.

PAYING HIS DEBT (Triangle—Five Reels)—Theme—Andante. Suggest "Reverie"—Vieuxtemp, "Romance in F"—Tschalkowsky, or "Sweet Ponderings"—Langley.

There are some dramatic moments in this picture that require big stuff well selected. The usual numbers of tensions and agitados prevail. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Triangle exchange.

WINNING OF BEATRICE, THE (Metro—Five Reels)—Theme—Valse Lento. Suggest "Sleeping Rose"—Borch, "Golden Hearted Daisies"—Williams, or "Bridal Bouquet"—Sawyer.

This is a modern business drama with touches of comedy sprinkled throughout it. The opening is dramatic and misterioso, and would suggest using the selection from "Othello," by Verdi. Thereafter it lightens up for a few hundred feet. Then a misterioso is followed by a furioso segueing into a big dramatic tension. Again we have light stuff for almost two reels. The last reel must be of a broader quality of music, and finish with the theme. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Metro exchange.

The Star Spangled Banner.

A BILL proposing to make "The Star Spangled Banner" the official national anthem again provokes inquiry into the history of its author, the debated origin of its music and the various attempts to induce Congress to adopt the hymn of the American nation. Numerous musicians have proposed alterations of the music with a view to simplifications, but none has ever been officially recognized. The most recent endeavor to provide a uniform form of the music was made by the distinguished committee of three musicians, O. G. Sonneck, J. P. Sousa and Walter Damrosch.

This new version shows no change in the essential features of the anthem. The tune is practically the same, but altered slightly in rhythm. There are a few minor changes in the harmony and the bass progression has been rewritten to conform to the rules of harmony and theory. It is decidedly superior in every way to the old form. It has breadth and majesty. It flows more freely and requires less effort to sing it. It can be had in orchestral form and though you may be accused of misplaying the national hymn, we would advise every leader to get it. There is a tendency to look around for something as a substitute for this unofficial national anthem and we feel that every musician should do his part towards the official recognition of our traditional song, "The Star Spangled Banner."

It has a peculiar history. About the year 1775 a poem called "To Anacreon in Heaven" was written by one Ralph Tomlinson, and set to music by John Stafford Smith. This song was sung for years by the Anacreontic Society of Ludgate Hill, London, England, and shortly gained vogue in America. It took preference over the old English glees and madrigals because of its simplicity and inherent strength.

About the year 1814 Francis Scott Key wrote a patriotic poem, which at first bore no title, but found much favor because of its fervor. Auto-graphed copies were much sought after, and as the demand grew Key named it "Defense of Fort McHenry," later changing it to "The Star Spangled Banner." The poem was used everywhere and became one of the classics of American literature of the time.

Judge Joseph Hopper Nicholson, a brother-in-law of Key, is credited with the printing of the poem and singing it to the tune of "To Anacreon in Heaven." The melody fitted the meter with a little stretching and he so liked the effect that he had it put into song form. This forever wedded the music and the words, and we were given the hymn which we now sing as our national anthem.

J. Norris Hering, the music critic of the Baltimore Star, has been for many years devoting his energies towards legislation that would give the United States an official national air. Baltimore being the birth place of "The Star Spangled Banner," and naturally the clearing house for all data regarding it, we can well hold him as an authority on the subject. He claims that six measures have been introduced in Congress since last spring calling for official recognition and adoption of "The Star Spangled Banner" as our national hymn, but for various reasons they have been referred to Committee and quietly shelved.

We can never expect to get what we want unless we ask for it. Asking once is not sufficient, for sometimes we must obtain it through our very importunity. Let us become importunate to the *n*th degree and gain the much-needed official sanction of one song which we can call our national anthem without fear of argument.

Music for "When Men Betray."

They say that any fool can pull down a house, but it takes a good architect to build it again. We fully appreciate this trite saying, and always keep it in mind when called upon to criticize the work of others. We try to be constructive in our reviews of the music that is set to pictures, always keeping in mind the fact, that only by close and analytical scrutiny can we hope to elevate the music for the motion picture industry.

The musical setting given to the feature "When Men Betray" proved most pleasing in the main. Long selections were used with just sufficient melody to hold the ear and keep the interest in the picture. The sad scene fitted with Gabriel-Marle's "Lamento" proved very effective and the double theme idea was carried out with a judicious intermingling of lighter music that in no wise confused the mind as to who was represented. There was a splendid opportunity for realistic effect during the scene showing the ingenue dancing to a tune from a phonograph. If a Victrola had been used behind stage, properly timed, and accurately operated, the scene would have lived in the minds of the audience. Besides the possibility for a real effect it would have lent orchestral coloring.

Speaking of effects, we were surprised to hear Mr. Telephone ringing every time an artist picked up the receiver. This belongs to the "stone age" of pictures and long has been regarded as clap-trap by those striving to raise the standard of picture music. We are inclined to believe that the drummer must have sprung this on our friend, Mr. Lutz, at the last minute, as his selection of music, with a few exceptions, showed an uplifting trend. Especially was this noticeable during the vision of the marriage ceremony. Most leaders would have introduced the much-abused Wedding March and killed the scene, but Mr. Lutz properly regarded the scene as irrelevant.

The two outstanding errors in judgment seemed to be the "Prelude," by Rachmaninoff, and "The Tempest," from the Overture of "William Tell." Mr. Lutz could not be guilty of these gross misconceptions and we feel that they were forced upon him by "The Shakespeare of the Screen." A wordy argument in no way should disrupt the elements and call forth the thunder and lightning of the storm, evident in "The Tempest." The climax of the picture needed a very heavy dramatic selection, but because of the accepted interpretation of the "Prelude" and its well-known associations, a more appropriate number should have held this spot.

Looking at the general effect produced by the music we must say in all justice that it fulfilled its mission and, but for the two exceptions mentioned, never transcended the picture.

A National Conservatory of Music and Art.

There is a movement on foot for the establishment of a National Conservatory of Music and Fine Arts to be established by the Government. This is a step to the right direction, and every musician and music lover should further this movement in every way.

This is not a case of "filling a long felt want," it is not a political move to make another position on the long list of "Government Jobs," nor is there behind the movement any motive of self aggrandizement. We need a Conservatory officially sanctioned and properly controlled by the Government. We need a standard curriculum of studies that a pupil must follow, and, before receiving his "sheep-skin," pass a stiff examination therein. We need a Minister of Fine Arts whose duties will consist in attending to such legislation as will further the interests of art, protect the real artist from the charlatan, and educate the masses to a higher appreciation of music, paintings, sculpture, architecture, and other allied though lesser arts.

Schools and conservatories for music abound all over the country. Some are good, while some are decidedly bad. Anyone can start a conservatory. The diploma simply states that you have finished the course prescribed in that school. If the curriculum be light, naturally the pupil gets little real value for the time spent, and the diploma does not represent the completion of a thorough course in the branch of music undertaken. This leaves the way open for teachers of mediocre ability to foist on the pupil untenable theories and turn on the public half-baked musicians. This condition is largely to blame for the slow advance of Americans in musical fields. The grounding they receive so frequently is entirely wrong, and years must be spent in unlearning those things which they were taught to believe.

Music as taught in our public schools should have the attention of a capable supervisor. No definite plan is followed to instill into the minds of the children the elementary principles of music. Many of those teaching it as an added subject, could not pass an examination in rudiments, and are in no way qualified to class themselves as musicians. They are wasting their time, the money of the taxpayer, and distorting the minds of young America so that they hate the name of music.

France has its Minister of Fine Arts, why should we be so little interested in this phase of our national life? In England music is taught in every school, and is a compulsory subject. Music teachers must prove their ability by passing an examination set forth by one of the universities controlled by the Government. The text books prescribed for this subject are as carefully considered as those used for mathematics. Can we afford to jeopardize the future musical knowledge of our children by slipshod methods?

We appeal to every musician in the picture playing cohorts for help for taking up this good movement for the betterment of his art. The Moving Picture World will send in your name along with thousands of other petitioners requesting that Congress establish a National Conservatory of Music, and that a Secretary for Fine Arts be appointed. Don't let this opportunity pass. No action can be taken unless we have the active support and co-operation of every musician in America. Let the picture industry be well represented in this mighty movement for good.

Wanted—Military Precision.

Colonel G. is a fine commander, but not a musician. He sent for the chief musician of his regimental band one day and delivered this scathing criticism:

"I notice a lack of uniformity about the band which must be regulated. Yesterday morning they were out on parade, and the largest man in the band was playing a little bit of an instrument—and you had the big drum played by a small man. That sort of thing doesn't look well, and must be attended to. I want the small men to play small instruments and the big men the big instruments. And another thing—I want the trombone players to slide their instruments in and out in unison. It annoys me to see them all out of step with their hands."

Musical Suggestion Synopsis.

BRAVEST WAY, THE (Paramount—Five Reels)—Theme—Valse Lento. Suggest "The Kingdom of Flowers"—Ringleben, "Valse Slave"—Savasta, or "Lady Picking Mulberries"—Kelly.

This is a Japanese picture calling for a complete Japanese setting as far as possible. To help the leader we submit the following list of Japanese music that may prove beneficial:

- "Japanese Patrol".....(March) by Tobani
"Veil Dance".....(Ballet) by Friml
"Jap's Tattoo".....(March) by Lawrenceau
"Fuji Koe".....(Intermezzo) by Shelley
"The Bombardment".....(March) by Heed
"Japanese Reverie".....(Andantino) by Bartlett
"The Kingdom of Flowers".....(Valse) by Ringleben
"Poppies".....(Romance) by Moret
"A Night in Japan".....(Suite) by Brahm
"Japanese Sunset".....(Meditation) by Zamanick

Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paramount Exchange.

BRIDE'S AWAKENING, THE (Universal—Six Reels)—Theme—Moderato. Suggest "Dans Les Roses"—Barthelmy, "Basket of Roses"—Albers, or "Dance of the Rose Maidens"—Brahms.

Light music will fit this picture throughout with the exception of a hurry in the first and fourth reel, a fox-trot in the fifth and some dramatic tensions in the last three reels. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Universal Exchange.

CABARET, THE (World—Five Reels)—Theme—Moderato. Suggest "Serenade"—Chaminade, "Sparklets"—Miles, or "Whispering Willows"—Herbert.

La Boheme selections will fit this picture admirably. Nothing could be more effective as a general delineator of the characteristic studio scenes here shown. Note the cabaret scene in the opening, using selections of popular song hits and the stage performance in the third reel. Here you need a tango. There is a strong dramatic value that must receive careful consideration in your musical setting. The use of a guitar soloist would enhance the picture. Cue sheets can be obtained from the World Film Exchange.

CONFESSION (Fox—Five Reels)—Theme—Unnecessary.

Open with the "Pique Dame Overture," followed by Lohengrin's "Wedding March." Next you will need an allegro, agitato and Valse lento, a slow andante, a misterioso, agitato and "Reverie" by Vieuxtemp. The balance of the picture is decidedly dramatic to the end. Note the silence effect when the Governor tells of the execution. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Fox Exchange.

DESSERT WOOLING, THE (Paramount—Five Reels)—Theme—Tempo di Valse. Suggest "Amaryllis"—Vecsey, "Estellita"—Herbert, "I Am Waiting for You, Darling"—Williams.

The story is dramatic, but not entirely so. There are many opportunities for pastoreale music and bright andantinos. Note the pistol shot early in the fifth reel. A few good numbers that will fit this picture are as follows: "The Wooing Hour"—Zamecnik, "Woodland Whisper," Czibulbeu, "Ballett Sentimantal"—Zamecnik. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paramount Exchange.

DESTINY (Metro—Five Reels)—Theme—Valse Lento. Suggest "Golden Hearted Daisies"—Williams, "Just a Little Love"—Silseu, "Waters of Venice"—Von Tilzer.

This is a tense drama that requires careful handling for a proper musical interpretation. Nothing popular or well known should be used outside of the cafe scenes. Many religious are needed and the general trend of the music should be sombre. During the introduction of the allegorical characters, lust, avarice, rum, passion, etc., special themes should be used symbolic of these attributes. Organ can be used effectively at T. "Dawn till" T. "In the Palace" and from D. "When boy enters convent" to T. "The Hand of Time." Cue sheets can be obtained from the Metro Exchange.

MATING OF MARCELLA (Paramount—Five Reels)—Theme—Italian Folk Song. Suggest "O Sole Mio," "Maria Mari."

This holds Italian atmosphere throughout and the music should be distinctive. Choose only numbers that have the flavor of Italy in them. You will need a fox-trot and an agitato for irregular stuff. A list of Italian music that can be used for this picture follows:

- "Serenata".....Tarenghi
"Songs from Italy".....Langey
"A Day in Venice".....Nevin
"Two Venetian Songs".....Tanara
"Glitanella Sulte".....Helnrichs
"Carnival Venetian".....Benjmein
"Le Romance De Pierrot Et Pierrette".....Benjmein
"La Columbe".....Gounod

Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paramount Exchange.

WHEN MEN BETRAY (Graphic—Six Reels)—Theme—Andante. Suggest "Elyslum"—Speaks, "Evening Devotion"—Kohler, or "Meditation"—Lelgh.

This story is dramatic society atmosphere. You will need waltzes, serenades and bright intermezzos. Long selections will meet your needs and no hurrys or agitados are required. A few dramatic tensions and some big stuff can be fittingly used. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Graphic Film Co.

VIVIETTE (Paramount—Five Reels)—Theme—Tempo Rubato. Suggest "Al Fresco"—Etecenne, "Under the Leaves"—Thome, or "Mock Morris"—Gralnger.

This picture is very light and lively in the main, but there are some moments of sadness and dramatic intensity. Note the explosion early in the first reel. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paramount Exchange.

Leaders Service Bureau.

Questions Answered—Suggestions Offered.

Q.—What do you think of using one of the musicians out of the orchestra and "spot-lighting" him as a soloist between shows?

A.—It is an excellent idea and one that has been used with great success in the Rialto and Strand Theaters of New York City. If you have the facilities greater results can be obtained by using a "baby spot" upon the face only, of the artist.

Q.—Would you suggest linen suits for the orchestra during the summer months.

A.—Some theaters have tried the experiment and have found that, unless the orchestra is completely hidden from a direct line of screen vision, there is a degree of reflective light upon the picture. It would be better to have them dressed in black alpaca.

Q.—I have composed some special music that I think could be cued in on most pictures, and would like to know where I can find a good arranger to make orchestrations. Do you know of any? Is there any demand for such music and would a publisher be interested in buying such compositions?

A.—Already the market is flooded with such stuff, but if it be of exceptional merit and suitable for arranging in album form, it would have a chance of a publisher's acceptance. However, we would advise you that it is a hard row to hoe and, at the best, would bring but small remuneration for your creative ability and hard work. Regarding arrangers, we are in a position to offer you names of many who are considered experts in their line. If you desire such information, an addressed envelope and four cents in stamps will bring it to you.

Q.—There's a woman across the street from me studying voice, who screeches five hours daily, and there's a fellow on the floor above who is ambitious to become a cornetist and strives untiringly to get a "lip." Is there not some law to regulate such nuisances, or send them to the South Sea Isles?

A.—We are not a legal department, and confine our efforts solely to the interests of the exhibitor and his orchestra leader. However, as man to man, we would advise that if you are fortunately of a healthy and robust stature and combative nature, the best plan would be to "clean house."

Q.—Will musicians be classed as non-useful in the new selective draft amendment—"Work or Fight"?

A.—They certainly will, unless they hold regular and steady positions in theaters.

Q.—What is the usual pay for musicians at summer resorts and are union men allowed to accept "board and lodging" as part pay?

A.—For non-union musicians the salary depends on what they are willing to accept. While there is a regular rate authorized by the union for such engagements, if the salary and the regular rate of "board and lodging" equals the minimum union rates per week, we do not see where there would be any complaint from the union. Be on the safe side and ask the Secretary of your local.

Q. Is there any diminution in the interest shown for singers at the larger theaters in New York?

A. In New York the singers have become part of the show and are here to stay. Judgment has always prevailed in employing only the best talent, and you can readily understand that with the price of admission so small the opportunity of hearing good songs well sung is not passed by. In smaller cities it has been found that local talent have a splendid drawing capacity if not used too frequently. The style of song most popular at present is the old fashioned ballads well staged with lighting effects.

Q. I am beginning to build my library along the lines of the works of the individual composers, that is, getting every available number composed by a certain one before proceeding to the next. Of course, I must have variety for every-day use. What composer would you suggest first?

A. Get the works of Tschaiakowski. He was a prolific writer, and no composer ever lived that was so varied in style and atmosphere. His Russian music exemplified in symphonies, overtures and songs, are typical, while his Oriental numbers breathe of the East. Grieg should follow, as his entire writings are most suitable for pictures.

Q. Can music be procured for a saxophone quintet in sufficient quantities to use for pictures?

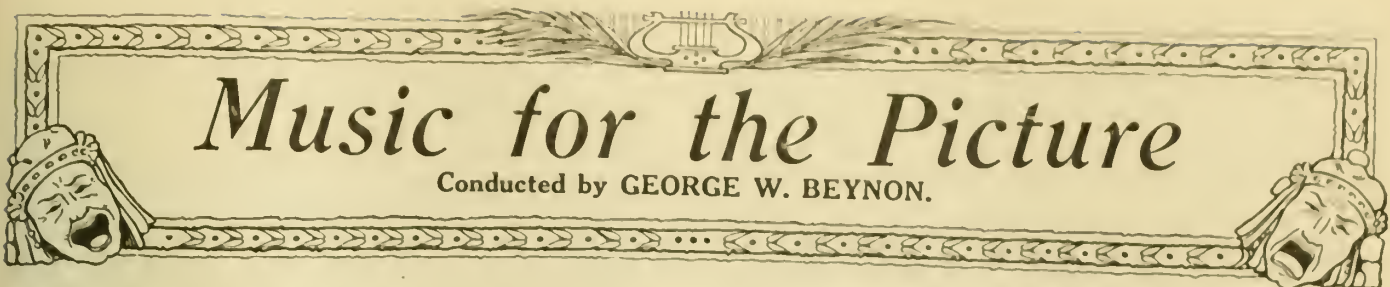

A. No. There is little if any music written solely for saxophones, but if you wish to introduce the instruments into your orchestra, the baritone saxophone readily plays from a cello part, the alto from a clarinet part transposed, and the soprano from the violin part. As an innovation we imagine it would be immense, but might become too "Jazzy" as a regular thing.

Q. What is the best instrumentation of a seven-piece orchestra for a small theater play pictures?

A. Piano, harmonium, two violins, flute, clarinet and cello.

Q. Can I get a list of music that can be played free?

A. We refer you to our printed lists in the Issues of November 10, November 24, December 1, December 29, January 12 and January 26. If you cannot readily procure these we will be pleased to send you a copy of them upon your request.

Getting Together.

FOR many moons we have diligently dilated upon the urgent necessity for closer co-operation between the musical director and the picture director. We have heartlessly harped upon the discrepancy of interpretation and consistently called for some action that would bring a closer unity of purpose. Motion picture directors themselves are coming forward and strongly advocating a conference with the musician. These directors realize that the leader can ruin all his painstaking preparations if it is not made clear what the underlying motive really means.

Exhibitors have expressed a keen desire to have unnecessary flashbacks and superfluous scenes eliminated from the picture in order that it may become more adaptable to music. The picture is the thing that they are showing, but without good music it cannot successfully be screened for their patrons. There are some rabid reformers that insist that pictures should fit the music, a reversion of the old conditions. This is going too far. Music can never dictate to pictures. We cannot expect the producer to first consider each scene as to its adaptability for music.

The time has come when music service plays as important a part in winning the exhibitor as any other form of service. We cannot say that it supersedes other forms, but every live manager considers his musical program as carefully as his lobby display or publicity matter. Every producer knows that he must have some sort of music service, and therefore a competent musician must prepare it for him. In preparing cue-sheets or scores he will naturally embody in them his personal impressions, and if left to himself will interpret the picture in his own way.

When he is doing piece work in a projection room, sometimes under adverse conditions, and always a bit hurried, he cannot give the concentration needed to turn out a good musical suggestion sheet. He enters the atmosphere of the picture totally unprepared for what is to be shown, and leaves with but a general idea of the dominant motive depicted.

There are good directors, fair directors, and poor directors of pictures. Each has his own ideas and ideals. Each works with but one object in view—to produce a masterpiece of film craft that will redound to the credit of his employers and himself. We have continually heard the howls from the bigger ones when an exhibitor cuts his film to suit the time limit of the theater. He claims that the house manager cannot cut it without killing it. Music can kill it more effectively. If the projection is bad in a house showing their picture the director will complain bitterly that his contrasts are not brought out properly, and the picture loses its color value. Music can make the picture appear positively lifeless in color.

Bearing these facts in mind and taking it for granted that the producer wants appreciation for his good pictures, why not bring the two directors together? It will mean co-ordination of picture and music that will tend to more clearly define the underlying principles involved. The day is not far distant when manufacturers will have their own musical department. Service today means more than it has ever meant as a talking point in feature selling and real music service would be hailed with wild enthusiasm by every theater owner in the country.

Consistency is another word that is well received by the buyers of film, providing the producer lives up to it. After spending thousands to make a picture, hundreds in exploitation of it, and carrying a first rate publicity department, strong in distribution, lavish with advertising and lobby display is it consistent to spend a measly few dollars for a cue-sheet and call it musical service? Wake up and look this music question squarely in the face. Later it may menace your very existence if you ignore it now.

Europe is the home of music, and bolstered up with musical lore it will naturally emphasize the musical phase of pictures, when, after the war, it enters into active commercial competition. At present we have all the advantages, but those advantages will only be useful while competitors do not see them. The instant they realize that we have deliberately overlooked or neglected to accept them they will take them away by utilization. There is a national side to this question that should appeal to all on account of its future commercial value.

Music at the Strand.

Warm weather always has its effect upon musicians and artists, as well as unduly influencing the pitch of their instruments. Summer is extremely trying to those that play pictures. The necessary grind is made so much harder by climatic conditions that it is necessary to alleviate the strain as far as possible to obtain the best musical results.

Mr. Harold Edel, always considerate of his musicians, has placed on his bill for the week of June 2 a number that required no music. "Capturing the Bear," depicted upon the screen and told by Bob Bakker, proved a distinct innovation. We could quarrel with Bob about his "lecture," but after all a fellow can't be a bear hunter and a college professor at the same time, so we must be satisfied, for the picture itself was mighty interesting.

"Prunella" was the feature shown, and little Marguerite Clark dug deeper into the hearts of the picture fans by her beautiful delineation of this well known character. The musical setting was all that could be asked for. It kept the light fairy atmosphere throughout, yet made the action live. The pizzicato effect in imitation of the guitar was well done, and so exactly timed that it did not overlap the scene. We don't know just how this was done, but would suggest to others that where a pizzicato effect must be made for a short duration and then played legato the proper method to pursue should be as follows. Select an Allegretto number in which the melody largely runs to arpeggios or broken chords. Play it with the bow until the signal is given for plucking the strings, and play pizzicato until the signal is given to return to the bowing. This method will perfectly synchronize the orchestral action with the action depicted.

"Loin du Bnl" played for the stage dancing was exactly what was needed, but Carl Reiser, who was conducting at the time, did not take the tempo of the dance, which jumbled things a bit. The Chinese number, following, marked the change of location splendidly, and the organ interlude for the few seconds of irrelevant action brought this piece in on time. By the way, the manner in which the organ cooperates with the orchestra could profitably be followed by other picture theaters.

Mlle. Zentay, violinist, played the "Carmen Fantasy" as arranged by Hubay. As an exhibition of dexterity and caesthetic exercise it was wonderful. There was a tendency toward poor intonation, and her bowing was certainly not what one would expect from Miss Zentay. The results were good, but like one who can typewrite speedily and accurately with one finger the method was wrong.

The overture was Flotow's "Martha," one of those good old favorites. "Martha," an opera in four acts, was first presented in Vienna in 1847. This opera was an extension of Lady Henrietta's ballet pantomime in three acts. It was first presented in Paris in 1884, and presented in New York in 1882 at the Metropolitan Opera House. The scenes of the opera are laid in Richmond during the reign of Queen Anne, but the Italian version places the action in the 15th century and the French in the 19th century. The success of the opera is principally due to the gay action and effective combination of the solo parts. "Martha" is Flotow's masterpiece, and few operas have been more frequently performed.

Mr. Spireaux conducted this number with a keen desire to have it over with. Because of this spirit the early part of the overture suffered, and the audience suffered too. Of course, the fact that it was the second last performance of the week may have had something to do with such carelessness, for it is the most natural thing in the world that a temperamental director should become sick of a piece that he has played all week. At the same time if his men felt the same way and gave in to that feeling, the director would have just cause to read the riot act.

Few directors realize their responsibility toward their players, audience, and employers. The position is most difficult to fill, because the entire success of the musical program devolves upon the conductor, while at the same time he must hold the confidence of his men, and a pleasing personality must be reflected back to his listeners.

Taking it by and large the program was neat and well chosen for hot weather enjoyment. Mr. Edel always has some new lighting effects which are pleasing, and his back drops used during the overtures are looked forward to with keen anticipation because they are always novel.

Music At the California Theater, San Francisco.

The California theater in San Francisco, in procuring Edward Benedict, the noted organist, to assist their already fine Symphony orchestra, has indicated its progressive spirit in the showing of pictures. Mr. Benedict inherits his wonderful ability from his father, who was probably one of the best organists of his day. All his life the son has lived with the organ. The atmosphere was entirely cluttered with it, so we can naturally expect big things from him.

"In music," he says, "one must appeal to the consciousness of the multitude, and to the masses minor strains with powerfully accented rhythms and with frequent use of the unvocal 'augmented second' interval invariably suggests crime just as to lovers of Beethoven and Handel six-eight rhythm suggest green fields and flocks of shepherds."

Mr. Benedict is a firm believer in the efficacy of musical scores, and believes that they should be specially composed, not compiled. He suggests a difficulty that has so far escaped our notice. He claims that the use of the masters frequently detracts from the picture, and that many of the patrons are forced to cudgel their brain to recall the names and authors of the composition played. This takes their mind off the picture, and the thread of the plot is lost to them.

Benedict's solution of the difficulty is at once simple and complete. He would have a printed schedule issued to the audience on or with the programs indicating the various selections which were to be used. Thus to the one who knew the selection, but was annoyed because he couldn't recall its source, reference to the program would relieve him of the aggravating doubt and permit him to continue to give to the picture that attention which his musical doubts had distracted from the filmed story.

His claim of this new faulty presentation no doubt is based upon facts, but we think that it is bringing the picture music art into the "hair-splitting" class before it has really established itself firmly as an art. His solution places a further burden upon the shoulders of the showman which he can scarcely carry. If the music be programmed it must be done thoroughly, as even a typographical error will cause more distraction and argument than would ignorance of the number.

In connection with the class of program that should be played Mr. Benedict says, "The proper method, I believe, is to endeavor to please all comers and at the same time so assemble your programs that the cultural tendency is gradually upward. I have found, for instance, that the so-called 'low-brow' can be surprised into approving Dvorak's "New World" symphony when he doesn't know what it is, and one of the most popular of my recent selections has been the largo movement of that symphony.

"On the other hand, I have not infrequently found the so-called 'high-brow' approving a popular song when played simply and with effectual use of the stops. If the melody is cheap, but, for the time being, popular in the streets and in the theaters, I give it to my audience on the basis of the merchant who aims to please. I try, however, as best I can to glorify its trivialities with such 'registration' as my ingenuity can devise.

"Music is an essential in the presentation of pictures. The world they disclose is soundless. The world we observe is not. The picture, to that degree of its silence, becomes unreal. Here is where music comes in to make up that discrepancy and allure the mind of the observer from contemplation of the stillnesses of the scenes which in real life are vibrant with action, contact, and struggle. This music must be of a nature to appeal, for otherwise it would not beguile anybody from consciousness of the unnatural stillness. Thus the musical tastes of the auditors must be consulted in order that they be not cheated of their enjoyment of the picture to see which they have paid their good money."

Under the able direction of Conductor McKinney the orchestra has developed into a fine body of men, and the music presented in this theater is of the highest standard. Our best wishes for continued progress and greater success goes out to this beautiful home of the motion picture in the city at the Golden Gate.

Musical Synopsis Suggestions.

FIND THE WOMAN (Vitagraph—Five Reels)—Theme—Andante. Suggest Peacefulness—Borch, Roma—Edwards, or Souvenir—Geehl.

This picture deals with the dramatic side of operatic artists in New Orleans. It is filled with action, and requires many excerpts from well known operas. At "T. Sol Robbins classed all—" use the intermezzo from "Cavalleria Rusticana." When the direct cue, "T. The Great Jewel Aria," appears use the "Jewel Song" from "Faust." A splendid effect can be obtained by using a phonograph back stage playing an operatic melody when Madeleine starts the Victrola. You will also need a few misteriosos, a furioso, and some dramatic tension stuff. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Vitagraph exchange.

FIREBRAND, THE (Fox—Five Reels)—Theme—Andante. Suggest Arioso—Frey, Dawn of Hope—Casella, or Extase—Ganne.

This story is one of particularly dramatic value, and will need all the big stuff that you can get into it. Be sure that you give variety, because the feature will drag otherwise. Many agitados, misteriosos, hurrys, dramatic tensions, and furiosos will be needed. Long themes will fit this picture better than anything else providing they have the requisite depth of feeling to them. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Fox exchange.

HIT-THE-TRAIL HOLLIDAY (Artcraft—Five Reels)—Theme—Unnecessary.

Light music again, a few agitados, hurrys, and one misteriosos. You may think some of these scenes will require a religious treatment. Hays some ready at any rate. Use the "Fire-music" from the Valkyrie if you have it during this mob scene. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paramount exchange.

KIDDER & KO (Pathe—Five Reels)—Theme for the Heroine—Moderato. Suggest Basket of Roses—Albers, Bowl of Pansies—Reynard, or Dainty Daffodils—Miles.

Light music is needed for this dramatic comedy. You will require some college stuff in the early part of the feature. A big agitato may be used in the hold-up scene. Serenades, intermezzos, and love themes will play the balance of the picture. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Pathe exchange.

LEND ME YOUR NAME (Metro—Five Reels)—Theme—Allegretto. Suggest Babillage—Castillo, Babbillage—Herbert, or Basket of Roses—Reynard.

Light music will be needed for this picture in the main. There is a bit of misterioso in the beginning and a hurry when Earl sees police guns. The balance of the picture can be played with light waltzes, serenades, and polkas. Close with the theme. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Metro exchange.

MAN HUNT, THE (World Film—Five Reels)—Theme—Moderato Capricc. Suggest Capricious Annette—Borch, Jacqueline—Behr, or Legend—Friml.

This is a comedy-drama. It has two distinct atmospheres which it would be well to strongly contrast in your music. The locations are in Europe and an American lumber camp. This first reel needs only light music, building up a bit during the second, with a hurry in the third and fourth. The fifth reel is dramatic, and closes with the "Wedding March." In view of the strong feeling against the Lohengrin and Mendelssohn marches we would suggest that you use Grieg's "Wedding Procession" instead. Cue sheets can be obtained from the World exchange.

PATRIOTISM (Paralta Plays—Six Reels)—Theme—Moderato and Scotch. Suggest Lass O'Killian—Stickles.

The story takes place entirely in Scotland, and the atmosphere is so strong that nothing but Scotch music will effectively put the picture over. Be sure to have "The Campbells Are Coming" and "The March of the Cameron Men." These two marches are needed. During the tableau scenes you will require three short emblematic numbers, "The Hundred Pipers" for the "Hieland-maun," "Rule Britannia" for England, and "Joan of Arc" or "Marseillaise" for Joan. When Robin first sees the picture of the Kaiser in the grotto it would be most effective to have the orchestra or organist strike three harsh and dissonant chords indicative of our hatred. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paralta exchange.

SHOOTING OF DAN MCGREW, THE (Metro Pictures—Five Reels)—Theme—Adagio. Suggest Adagietto—Berge, Prelude—Chopin, Reverie—Rissland.

This is the dramatization of the well known poem of the same name, and the action takes place in the Canadian Northwest. There is room for some good pastorale stuff and typical Canadian "shanty songs." There is a strong dramatic value and many scenes of intensity, so that you will require heavy music with dramatic tension qualities. The climax is reached just before the finish, and care must be taken lest you bring your musical climax too early in the feature and spoil the dynamic effect. Note the piano solo opportunities, using your judgment in their playing. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Metro exchange.

SMASHING THROUGH (Bluebird—Five Reels)—Theme for Heroine—Andante. Suggest Berceuse—Danbe, Dialogue—Meyer-Helmunth, or Even Song—Martin.

This picture is filled with action. It is Western in atmosphere, requiring the usual number of hurrys, galops, and misteriosos. It is distinctly melodramatic, with a few little touches of pathos. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Bluebird exchange.

SQUARE DEAL, A (Mutual—Five Reels)—Theme—Allegretto. Suggest Le Secret—Gautier, A Little Story—Lack, or Twilight—Bendix.

The picture opens brightly, and gradually works up the dramatic situations. Note the fox-trot in the second reel, one-step in the third, and dramatic tensions in the fourth. During the fifth there is an opportunity to introduce "Home Sweet Home" if you consider it advisable. Close with the theme. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Mutual exchange.

"Last Hope" In Jail.

Musicians are familiar with the account of the composition of "The Last Hope," by Gottschalk, which places the scene at Rio Janeiro, and accompanies it with an interesting account of the composer's intimacy with a Spanish family.

Some months ago a prominent California judge contributed a series of recollections to the Oakland Tribune. In the course of these reminiscences he referred to a once famous resort situated in a march later filled in for building purposes, "more famous for the wines and cuisine than for its morality." It was sometimes the subject of police raids.

Gottschalk visited San Francisco in the course of his travels and also Oakland. The story continues, "Tradition has it that Gottschalk, the pianist, was once arrested there, and that he wrote his famous 'Last Hope' while in the Oakland city jail."

Listening Feet.

A newspaper report of a piano recital in Seattle played by Josef Hofman records an interesting incident.

On the stage, about six feet from the pianist, sat a boy musician who is afflicted with deafness. In some way he had discovered that vibrations striking the nerve centers of his feet carried powerfully to his brain and produced impressions analogous to those made through the ear. In response to his request he had been allowed to sit on the stage close to the instrument with his shoes removed, so as to get the fullest possible benefit of the vibration.

He had been studying for some time Rachmaninoff's celebrated "Prelude" in C sharp minor, which Hofman had included in his program for the recital. That he received correct impressions is proven by the fact that he altered a number of the details of his own playing of the composition to accord with the great virtuoso's interpretation.

Leader's Service Bureau.

Questions Answered—Suggestions Offered.

Q. Is it true that Campanini has given Wagner operas in English in Chicago?

A. Campanini has given Wagner opera in Chicago with an all American cast, but never in English. We believe that it is his intention to give them in England with the same cast when English will be sung.

Q. Could you tell me where I could go to a whistling teacher to take a few lessons for my own personal use?

A. At the moment we are unable to give the name of a good whistling teacher. The greatest teacher, who was also the greatest whistling performer, Mrs. Shaw, has recently died, and there appears no one capable of taking her place. Claims may perhaps be made of being able to whistle and to teach the art, but hearing of such claimants shows their claims are not founded on fact. Whistling is done by forcing the breath through the contracted lips; a noise made in the throat is not whistling.

Proper Presentation of Pictures Musically. Orchestral Balance.

THE wise exhibitor sees the handwriting upon the wall and is increasing the number of men in his orchestra. He sees the tendency towards a large ensemble and notes the wonderful possibilities to be derived from a big body of musicians. In the first place it is good showmanship, as it gives his theater a distinction that will be sure to draw a better class of patrons to his box-office. This patronage takes up of the slack in his expense line, and though his overhead has been increased he will not feel it appreciably. A poor orchestra of any size is the most expensive adjunct to his business.

When an orchestra is to be augmented, or a larger one installed, there always comes the vexing question of instrumentation. What shall the orchestra consist of? How many violins should be used? How many string and wood-wind will be necessary to balance the brass section or vice versa? Is a harp needed or can a piano be used instead of second violins and violas?

There has always obtained a sort of general rule as to what constitutes an orchestra of a particular size. This rule has been followed more or less as a matter of course without any serious thought being given to the results. As a consequence, if an exhibitor desires a ten-piece orchestra he tells his leader to get him one, and the leader secures a collection of men playing the following instruments: Piano, cello, bass, flute, clarinet, cornet, trombone, drums and another violin beside his own. This really is a vaudeville orchestra completely top-heavy in the brass section and totally unsuited to properly play pictures.

It has never been thoroughly understood why American vaudeville houses adopted this combination because of the many points against it from the musical standpoint. It is entirely overbalanced, the string section being almost worthless when the brass is playing, while the wood-wind portion, as represented by the flute and clarinet, sounds peculiarly out of place. When the drums have a forte passage the entire orchestra is lost in the rumble of sound.

At first the performing artists tried to use music arranged for a concert orchestra, but had to give up the idea because of the conspicuous "holes" in the orchestration. It meant that all acts desiring even a respectable accompaniment were forced to have their music specially arranged. It became the reason for "Shoo-ly" music, and one of the longest strides backward that music in America has ever taken. English and foreign artists laughed at us and then swore justly. In spite of all criticism this combination of musicians became permanent in the variety theaters throughout the country and are still with us, much to our shame.

Orchestras of this make-up are to be found in many picture theaters and are worthless as an agency for picture portrayal. Many expedients are resorted to in order that the music will be at least bearable. Frequently the leader will "mute" his cornet and trombone to obtain a soft effect, but this becomes monotonous in time. Cello solos are introduced and are found effective, but if overdone, lose their variety value. If your orchestra be overbalanced no amount of ingenuity will cover up the fault.

In our opinion a ten-piece orchestra should be made up entirely of strings and wood-wind, with the trap drums for an occasional effect. A combination consisting of two violins, second violin, viola, cello, bass, flute, two clarinets and drums would be ideal for a thousand-seat house; a piano to be used to give tonal color and relieve the orchestra. The second violin player could double without the necessity of employing an extra man. Of course each player would have to be an expert on his instrument, because he could not depend upon the piano to cover up his sins of omission or commission. The music would be most soothing and yet would be able to rise to any occasion requiring volume. The use of the harmonium with the instrumentation would be excellent, as it could well take the place of the brass without introducing its blariness.

People have gotten beyond the point where noise will suffice their musical needs. They call for better music, more artistic rendition and more intelligent selection. They do not want to be entertained, as some leaders seem to think, by the music, for their purpose in coming is to see the picture presented in the best possible way. It is the business of the orchestra to accompany the feature, not play away from it by giving a concert. Therefore, the smoother the quality of tone the sweeter the playing, and the fewer the breaks in the music the greater will be the satisfaction of the audience.

For the inroads made by the organ in picture playing, the orchestras have nobody to blame but themselves. Musicians have been looking for jobs, and when employed they have ceased to think about improving their position. They take it for granted that because the combination is the same as they have been accustomed to lead that it fits the situation. They never consider the acoustic properties of the theater; they never think of beautifying their surroundings; they let their lights shine in the faces of the people, and as for seeking a better solution of their instrumentation problems, that never occurs to them.

Orchestral balance is not always possible, even in a careful selection of instruments. Sometimes, because of acoustic propensities, it may be necessary to "hide" the orchestra, allowing the sound to come through a curtain. Again, it may be necessary to change the positions of certain men or shift the whole orchestra to obtain the best results. The exhibitor depends on his orchestral leader to give him the best possible music with what he is given in the way of an orchestra. The first thing the leader must get is balance, and the way he gets it matters little. Change your men, change your instrument, change your position, change your seating arrangement, but get perfect tonal balance.

The contention may be raised that by dispensing with the brass in a small combination, the playing of the pictorial will suffer. It is a mistaken idea that it takes brass instruments to make a march sound well. Naturally a march will sound better with all brass as in a band, but we have heard a seven-piece orchestra "put over" marches with all the vigor and swing of a vaudeville combination and with a better balance. Brass instruments should not be added to any orchestra until the number of men playing have reached fourteen. When we speak of brass we do not include in this classification French horns which are really of the wood-wind family in their tonal relation.

The lack of balance in almost every case is found among the small orchestras, but once in a while we come across this fault in symphony aggregations. The habit which we have fallen into of dropping the viola and second violin parts, using the piano instead, is probably to blame for the scarcity of "filling" to be found in some symphony orchestras. The tonal quality of the piano prohibits its use in a large orchestra if proper balance be desired. The piano is not originally an orchestral instrument, but its wide range and facile execution has made it the stand-by of the American orchestra. In small combinations it is frequently necessary, and when played artistically, becomes a wonderful orchestral aid, but it is not needed in large orchestras and only tends to spoil the beauty of tone.

No set rules can be laid down for orchestral balance. Much depends upon the size of the orchestra, acoustics must be considered, individual playing enters into the problem, and instrumentation plays a large part, but after all, it lies with the leader to judge whether his orchestra is balanced rightly. Tests should be made from all parts of the theater, listening to the playing of a variety of numbers. If a leader will take up this problem conscientiously and solve it, his gratification will be the fact that it will remain a credit to himself and a box-office asset to the theater.

Music At the Rivoli.

With neatness and despatch and perfect artistry. These two trite sayings sum up the fine show presented at the Rivoli, during the week of June 9. The full two hours were knit together with a continuity that is seldom found in motion picture presentation. The costuming and "sets" used for the singers were in strict keeping with the songs' interpretations, while the lighting upheld the usual high standard of the Rivoli in this respect.

Erno Rapee conducted the overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor," by Nicolai, with a little different interpretation than is usually given to this well known number. His work is constantly improving and his results are becoming more clearly defined. He is gaining a broader sweep in the use of his baton, coupled with a more definite beat that will eventually stamp him as one of our best conductors in pictures.

This overture was produced in 1849, about a month before the composer's death, and the opera to which it belongs still holds the stage. Founded upon Shakespeare's play of the same name, it is a delightful musical setting of that rollicking comedy, and there is much charming melody and clever orchestration in it.

The Scene, showing "Mexico Today," was beautifully fitted by the use of La Feria Suite, by Lacombe. This was indeed a happy selection, inasmuch as the first two numbers were all that was required to play the entire reel, besides being admirably suited to the picture.

Miss Gladys Rice sang "Mighty Lak' a Rose," a little negro melody by Nevin. "Swanee River," played by the organ, served as a prelude to this song, and immediately established the coming atmosphere. As the curtains swung back there was disclosed a "set" representing a hut, bare of furniture, save a cradle, which was rocked to and fro by the singer dressed in the costume of the Civil War times. The orchestra accompanied the singer unaccompanied, with no lights showing in the stands. The idea was splendid, but the accompaniment was poor. It is sufficiently difficult to follow a singer under the best of conditions, so why handle both orchestra and vocalist by dropping the director. His presence would not have been conspicuous, the effect would have remained and a smooth performance insured.

The music for the pictorial was well chosen, and especially so when the pictures of the Marines were shown. The spotlight effect upon the flags hung a few feet in front of the proscenium arch was stirringly patriotic. It made one's blood tinkle with the love of country.

Following this the orchestra struck up "Over There," dying away as the curtains were drawn aside, showing us an old man seated in a chair by the window where the light streamed in upon his spectacled and blind eyes. Seated by him is a girl who does his seeing with the glowing eyes of devoted affection. Marching is heard in the distance and Greek Evans (for it is he) sings "The Americans Come." This song is strongly reminiscent of "The Veteran's Song" which held all England in the time of the Boer War. It has a martial swing and is intensely descriptive of the fulfillment of the hope that the Americans will come to turn the tide of battle.

Never have we been so favorably impressed with Mr. Evan's voice. It showed a richness that we hardly thought possible, while his top tones rang out with the clearness of a bell. The song suited him admirably.

The feature was "Hit-the-Trail Holliday," a comedy by George Cohan. It was well fitted though it required nothing but the lightest treatment. The opening showing Rome, Egypt, London and New York had special excerpts to indicate the atmosphere, which we considered par excellence. This little touch evinced the careful thought given to details that has made the Rialto-Rivoli shows what they are and which must be followed by every theater in the country eventually, if they present pictures properly.

Music At the Symphony.

The long-delayed opening of the Symphony theater occurred on June 14, when a private showing was given to warm the house. This home of the motion picture should be a big success. It is well laid out with every possible appointment for the convenience of its patrons. There are no posts to obstruct the view and the balcony arrangement is ideal and different.

Naturally the first performance is a bit ragged and we will not criticize it in the usual way. After the musicians have had a chance to acclimate themselves to picture playing there will be no question as to merit. The Symphony orchestra is composed of fifty musicians of more than ordinary calibre, conducted by Carlo Ronchi and his assistant, Enrico Leide. These leaders are excellent musicians and should give a good account of themselves when they have had a little experience in picture fitting.

The overture, which consisted of excerpts from "La Boheme," was rendered with true traditional interpretation, and though a little long for a picture show, was duly appreciated by the large audience. Mr. Ronchi certainly knows his "Boheme," and from this first taste of Italian opera we can expect some fine examples in the future.

The "Dance of the Hours," from the opera "La Gioconda," by eight ballet dancers and Mlle. Clara Tosca, was the finest thing we have seen outside of grand opera, and even there it has not been excelled in artistry. Some years ago you will probably remember it as it was put on at the Hippodrome, of New York. You will remember the furore it occasioned. To our mind this little divertissement shown at the Symphony is far and beyond it, in point of all-around excellence. Mlle. Clara Tosca compares favorably with the celebrities of the Terpsichorean art, and her miniature ballet ably supports her. This one number should be seen by every music lover who can get into the theater, and our opinion is that it will hold the boards for some time. At least we hope so.

The next best thing on the programme was the first number, called a Patriotic Tableau, and showing the village of Chateau-Thierry as it was being sacked and burnt by the horrible Hun. The music for this was wonderfully effective, and the lighting effects and fire scenes made the village seem intensely real. This was followed by good-looking young ladies appearing unwrapped in flags, representing the Allied nations. During this part of the tableau the orchestra played the National airs of each nation, and played them from beginning to end. This made the posing very long and slowed up the performance. A strain of each would have given the number more snap and is always good showmanship in the presenting of incidental numbers in the picture business.

A Mutt and Jeff comedy was shown and the organ played it. This is bad picture presentation musically. The organ is not suited to follow comedy matter. It spoils the fun and cannot give the necessary grotesqueness to convey the spirit of burlesque to the auditors. The organists at the Symphony are Harold Smith, formerly of the Broadway, and Mr. Cooper, who is also well known about town. Here we have a duo of tremendous possibilities. They are both long experienced artists in picture playing and one can rest assured that the organ portion of the programmes will be right up to the highest standards.

The feature was "The Unchastened Woman," featuring Grace Valentine. The picture does not give wide scope for musical setting, but the music used was satisfactory. The picture deals with a psychological subject with little physical action and, musically must have been a hard nut to crack for the first attempt at picture fitting in this new theater.

Altogether, the music was very good and great are our expectations. This theater is featuring its music, which is the right idea. It has the orchestra capable of doing big things. It has the conductors known for their musicianly ability, ably assisted by excellent organists. All it needs is time and experience to build up a name for picture settings that will set yet another high mark of perfection.

Musical Suggestion Synopsis.

CITY OF DIM FACES (Paramount—Five Reels)—Theme—Andante. Suggest "A Japanese Sunset"—Deppen, of "Japanese Reverie"—Bartlett. This is a Chinese picture and of course the Chinese atmosphere must be held throughout. Chinese music is very limited, and a judicious use of the traps will aid materially in conveying the necessary effects. We would suggest that the opera "Iris," by Mascagni, be used, if possible, as it has wonderful dramatic possibilities. The following list may be helpful to the leader in selecting for this picture:

Hop Sing—Chinese Fantasie.....Katzenstein
Sultan's Guard—Patrol.....Gro
Chinese Wedding Procession—March.....Hosmer
In a Chinese Tea-Room—Andante.....Lankey
Lady Picking Mulberries—An Episode.....Kelley
Sunset Land—Moderato.....Kawelo
Oriental Nights—Valse.....Grant
Chinese Highbinder Patrol.....Johnson
First Born—Chinese Serenade.....Johnson
Chinese Serenade.....Puerner
Ching
Chinese Patrol.....Puerner
Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paramount exchange.

ELEVENTH COMMANDMENT, THE (Advanced Motion Picture Co.—Six Reels)—Theme—Andante. Suggest "Elysium"—Speaks, "Peacefulness"—Borch, or "Extase"—Ganne.
"Extase"—Ganne.

The character of this picture is a modern drama of the tense variety. You will need rather classic stuff for this feature of the heavier nature. A good effect can be made by carefully selecting quiet numbers to fit the scenes where the heroine is shown, and where you are not playing her theme. Long selections will fit till you reach the fifth reel, when you will require a misterioso, followed by a dramatic agitato, a dramatic andante, a dramatic tension and an agitato. Close then with the theme. Cue sheets can be obtained from the producers.

KAISER'S SHADOW, THE (Paramount—Five Reels)—Theme—Unnecessary.

This is a picture filled with dramatic events of the time of war. You will need agitados, a few misteriosos, and a furioso. There is a good opportunity to use the Marseillaise Hymn, and you may be tempted to incorporate the Star Spangled Banner in the fourth reel. Do not use our national anthem, but select some other well known American patriotic air. The scenes are laid in Berlin and an American city. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paramount exchange.

LAST REBEL, THE (Triangle—Five Reels)—Theme—Andante Simple and Southern. Suggest "Pleading"—Wood, "Southern Reverie"—Bendix, or "Ponderings"—Langey.

This feature is divided into two parts, one portion showing a story during the Civil War times, and the other enacted fifty years later. The atmosphere of both is Southern, yet a distinction should be made in the music transition to strongly emphasize the different periods. Open with old Southern melodies, getting in suitable numbers to fit the darky characters. The music of the later period should be chosen after careful research work. There is much pathos in the feature, and you should note the fight with the band of thugs and the attempted drowning of the heroine. No cue sheets are available for this picture, so it would be well to get a pre-viewing if possible. It deserves a good musical setting.

MADAME SPHINX (Triangle—Five Reels)—Theme—Andantino. Suggest "Premier D'Amour"—Benoist, "Enchanted Hour"—Mouton, or "Serenade"—Jeffery.

This is a mystery story wound about the murder of the guardian of the heroine. Open with the first movement of the Unfinished Symphony which will carry the action nicely to the end of the first reel. You will then need some dramatic tension stuff, misteriosos and agitados. Note the big fight in the Apache den which lasts for almost five minutes. A long hurry will fit this. Close with the second movement of the unfinished. Cue sheets have been discontinued by the Triangle Film Co.

ONLY ROAD, THE (Metro—Five Reels)—Theme—Moderato and Spanish. Suggest "Serenata"—Crespi, "Serenade"—Tarenghi, or "La Paloma."

Here is your chance to get some Spanish atmosphere into your setting. The action takes place on the Mexican Border and is intensely dramatic. You will need some misteriosos, agitados, dramatic tensions, and so forth, but try to select your incidental concert numbers with a view to their Spanish flavor. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Metro exchange.

SOCIAL QUICKSANDS (Metro—Five Reels)—Theme—Allegretto. Suggest "Impish Elves"—Borch, "In the Shadows"—Finck, or "Mussdora"—Leigh.

This is a comedy drama enacted in society of wealth and position. Light and trippy music will be needed almost entirely. A few two-steps, one rag, and some light waltzes. Note the piano solo towards the end of the third reel. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Metro exchange.

STOLEN ORDERS (Brady Production Co.—Eight Reels)—Theme for Miss Gordon—Andante. Suggest "Andante"—Mendelsohn, "Wedding Morn"—Luscomb, or "Meditation"—Leigh.

Melodramatic music in large quantities will be needed for this feature. It is a war picture, the action taking place in America. When the balloon is chased by the aeroplane don't use a galop, but select a number with sweeping string effects and vivace in tempo. Note the fight between the hero and the German diplomat. Be careful to refrain from using too much obvious German music. Cue sheets can be obtained from the World Film exchange.

You may not be able to fight, but you can save and buy War Savings Stamps.

Music for the Picture

The Proper Presentation of Pictures Musically. Playing the Pictorial.

"Seated one day at the organ, he was weary and ill at ease,
And his fingers wandered idly over the NOISY keys."
Apologies to "The Lost Chord."

HE was playing the pictorial, not with it but at it. The changing scenes showing the news of the day had little interest for him, and he hanged away on marches and waltzes, some fitting by accident, while others burlesqued the picture. No thought had been given his program for this part of the performance. How could his employer expect it when he had used up his ingenuity in fitting the feature. The pictorial was only a filler anyway, while people expected something from the feature. So he continued his crazy hanging, and the patrons became "weary and ill at ease" also. Shortly after this wonderful display of talent he lost his position, and is today wondering how the theater can get along without him. We beg to state that from the latest bulletins we are informed that the theater is still doing business at the old stand, while this musical luminary roves at large "seeking whom he may devour."

This method of fitting the topical review is obsolete. There was a time when the orchestra leader selected a couple of marches and three waltzes which he made do for the pictorial. When the May Festival was shown he started a bright waltz intermezzo, and when a thirty second scene showing the funeral of one of our noted members of Congress was flashed upon the screen he continued the number right through it because it was so short and the scene following portrayed the interior of a famous artist's studio. The incongruity of it was passed over lightly in those days because of the ignorance prevailing regarding musical settings.

Through the consistent and constant efforts of those musical directors who are striving to uplift the picture music we have arrived at a stage where every picture must receive a suitable accompaniment. Patrons have become familiar with the art of picture fitting through attending those theaters where large orchestras are maintained and high priced conductors interpret the pictures. No slipshod methods will be tolerated any longer by those that pay admission to see and HEAR.

Fundamentally there are no set rules for fitting the animated magazine, and for that very reason no definite class of music can be selected beforehand. It is as necessary to pre-view a pictorial as it is compulsory to prepare the feature. In fact, as no cue sheets are distributed for the former, it really becomes more necessary to see what scenes must be fitted. It is not always wise to run the pictorial in the shape that it is received from the maker. Frequently by changing the positions of certain scenes a better musical setting is procurable. This means that the orchestral leader and the house manager should confer on the matter, and often the operator can be of valuable assistance in giving suggestions.

In order to suggest the possibilities in this science it is necessary to work from a possible hypothesis. Suppose that we have a Screen Telegram showing the following subjects in the order named: 1. DU PONT POWDER MILLS. 2. RED CROSS PARADE. 3. BAN JOHN-SON AT THE BASEBALL PARK. 4. GENERAL PERSHING REVIEWING THE FRENCH SOLDIERS. 5. COMMENCEMENT EXERCISES AT YALE. 6. THE ARRIVAL OF PRESIDENT WILSON. 7. THE AMERICAN ARMY IN FRANCE. 8. COLORED PARSON BAPTIZING HIS BAPTIST FLOCK.

You will readily see that these scenes must be shifted, as it would be folly to finish the review with the sprinkling water act. The scenes should work up to a climax of hearty applause, and to get this effect you must close with one of the patriotic scenes, or that of President Wilson. At the same time it would not be good showmanship to group all the "hand-getters" together. There should be a breathing space between each to allow for greater effectiveness. Our idea would be to arrange the scenes in the following manner: 1, 3, 4, 5, 8, 2, 6, and 7.

This grouping will give you ample variety of tonal color and change of tempo. The first item showing how gunpowder is made and delivered to the army is largely educational and neutral in atmosphere. You can use a light moderato with a pleasing melody and of considerable length. This gains the interest of the spectators at once. No. 3 gives you the opportunity of playing that old favorite, "Take Me Out to the Ball-Game." It will probably be short, and the chorus once through will fill the time allowance.

Now in No. 4 you have no choice but to play "March Lorraine." This is the official French march always played when the troops are on review. Don't make a mistake by playing an American patriotic number for General Pershing because even though you may desire to be courteous, you must first be accurate in the portrayal of the atmosphere.

To vary the music a little you might play for No. 5 a light waltz if the action will permit it. You cannot go wrong if you use the "Boola-Boola Song," which is typical of the Yale University. If they are only handing out diplomas play it pp only as a suggestion. There is no doubt that a scene of this sort would be short, and you could readily finish on the phrase.

No. 8 has many possibilities in the line of interpretation. If you can afford to do so it might bring a laugh to burlesque this portion by playing, "It Takes a Long, Tall, Dark Skinned Gal to Make a Preacher Lay His Bible Down." A strong darky spiritual would certainly be appropriate, while some plaintive Southern coon song would not be amiss. Do not play "Mighty Lak a Rose."

After this little bit of quiet humor the audience is in form for No. 2, and when they hear the strains of "Onward Christian Soldiers" they are bound to break forth in rounds of applause. Do not play this number at a quick step, but with the natural dignity which befits it. You now have the fullest attention when our President is shown.

For No. 6 choose another march of grandiose quality, or some patriotic air that would fit the situation. It will naturally be very short, so that you can quickly change into that most popular of all songs for the present, "Over There," when our army is shown marching in France. This is a fitting finish to a fine pictorial. The interest has not been allowed to lag, nor have you over-shot the climax. Be sure that when the marching soldiers appear that the music is kept in perfect time with their step. This is an art in itself.

Start all your pieces softly, and continue playing p while the subtitle is on the screen, then break into the required volume of sound immediately upon the action. If further subtitles appear in the same scene again quiet down until they fade out. For neutral scenes like No. 1 keep the orchestra down, cutting out the brass altogether. Do not play at any time ff before reaching your climax. Grade your volume according to the action, and when the big moment comes you have the power to emphasize it.

Never use clap-trap effects in the pictorial. It is nows that is being shown, not melodrama. Do not forget that the patrons have probably read all about what they see, and they have associated them with things of dignity. Do not jar their sense of news dignity by the clanging of cow-bells.

The entire review must be played with snap whether it be played softly or loudly. To use draggy music is to kill it. The execution of each number should be clean cut and definite, the finishes on a cadence, and the attacks on the beat.

It is said that genius is the art of taking pains. Every theater can have a genius if the leader so desires it. A genius in the orchestral pit means a full house, a full house means a successful business and satisfied boss, and good business means a raise in salary. So it pays to be a genius.

Music At the Rialto.

During the week beginning June 16 the Rialto gave one of those snappy musical performances for which it has become justly noted. The overture formerly known as "Orpheus in der Unterwelt"—before the Ilun showed his most despicable falsity—but now programmed as "Orpheus in the Lower World," was exceptionally well played by the Symphony orchestra; Dr. Hugo Reisenfeld at the baton. Mr. Reisenfeld has the happy faculty of so marking his contrasts that one is frequently amazed by his audacity, yet he never fails to obtain the subtle phrasing for which he calls. The overture is taken from the opera which is based upon the old Grecian myth, in which it was claimed that Orpheus attempted to bring back to life, Eurydice, his dead wife.

Though the work is not a difficult one to perform, yet there are shadings and delicate gradations of tonal beauty that if overlooked would deprive the overture of its popularity. The music is light, but must be well marked in its varied change of tempo. The hearty and spontaneous applause was a true tribute to the excellence of its performance.

We must disagree with the gentleman who selected the music for the educational called "Mt. Lassen in Action." His selection was altogether too bombastic and too highly flavored with Orientalism to correctly convey the atmosphere of grandeur and power as depicted in the scenic. There was one spot during the showing of the actual eruption where it might have been used properly, and in view of the fact that it was necessary to da capo twice to play the picture through we feel that the substitution of a quieter and more pastorale number in the opening would have brought greater satisfaction.

Miss Annie Rosner sang "Beau Zil Love You, Dear" (at least that is how it sounded), by Charles Hawley. This little lady has a mighty good voice, but is handicapped by stage mannerisms and facial expressions that mean nothing but detract from the song. Her enunciation is sacrificed for purity of tone, and her interpretation is offered up on the same altar. In a song as well known as "Because I Love You, Dear," it is unwise to change it, especially to alter a note to gain a spectacular finale. Composers usually know what they want when they write the song.

Emanuel Litz, a basso, whom we heard some time ago, has certainly improved his style and stage presence. In the "Vulcan's Song," from the opera, "Philemon and Baucis," he showed himself thoroughly at home. His top tones were a bit off, as one always expects in a basso, but the richness of his lower register more than made up for it. His enunciation is also much improved, the words being more clean cut without losing the natural resonance.

This number was costumed, and from the side panels one could see smoke rising over the mountain tops, while a red light glowed and waied as the song was sung. This created the atmosphere usually associated with the fiery forge.

The feature, "Missing," was admirably fitted and well directed by our old friend Joseph Klein. Little touches like "In the Gloaming" and "Bonnie Sweet Bessie" enhanced the heart interest immeasurably. We were pleased to note that during the wedding scene the orchestra did NOT play the usual Wedding March.

The Rialto Animated Magazine did not come last on the program, but we take the liberty of finishing our review with a few comments on this offering inasmuch as it was the outstanding bright spot in the bill. Without going into detail and showing why you must take our word for it. The changes of music were most suitable and beautifully timed. There was no overlapping of scenes, while the numbers were those that bore a meaning analogous to the scenes shown. Mr. Finston welded the baton for this item and put lots of ginger into his work. The magazine is always worked out in sequential order, and the music follows the same route. There is considerable art in selecting suitable music for the pictorial, and the Rialto stands high as an exponent of that art.

Musical Suggestion Synopsis.

ALL WOMAN (Goldwyn—Five Reels)—Theme—Allegretto. Suggest "Romance"—Rubens, "Nodding Tulip"—Trinhays, or "Shadowland"—Gilbert.

This feature will need some rather heavy stuff to bring out the dramatic values. A few "rube" numbers will go well to start the picture gradually working up to dramatic tensions. You will need a few burrys, dramatic agitados, and a storm furioso. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Goldwyn exchange.

BLUE-EYED MARY (Fox—Five Reels)—Theme unnecessary. The opening is dramatic. Start with a slow andante, then a misterioso, followed by a slow maestoso number. Then you can use Herbert's waltz from "The Debutante," as there appears a direct cue. The music will need to be constantly heavy throughout. Note the hurry, misterioso, and agitato in the fourth reel followed in the fifth by dramatic stuff. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Fox exchange.

CONQUERED HEARTS (Ivan Film Co.)—See synopsis in an issue. CLAWS OF THE HUN (Paramount—Five Reels)—Theme—Moderato. Suggest "Legend"—Friml, "Serenade"—Widor, or "Romance"—Mericcanto.

This is a patriotic film which must be fitted with strong, snappy music indicative of the big love for country. The first reel will need only light serenade stuff. At the T. Carl Von Helm, a fearsome and harsh number should be used emblematic of our hate. Note the direct cue for "Over There," and close the feature with the same selection. Watch for the auto crash effect in the fourth reel and the shots in the last. You will also need some pathetic music during the scenes with the mother and son. Romberg's "Mother" would fit admirably. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paramount exchange.

HEART OF A GIRL, THE (World Film—Five Reels)—Theme—Andante Semplice. Suggest "Peacefulness"—Borch, "Choral"—Corelli, or "Eventide"—Schytte.

The character of this feature is a dramatic depiction of political life in Washington. There is nothing particularly difficult in fitting this picture. The usual number of hurrys, agitados, and misteriosos to which is added some pathetic music, some dramatic tensions, and a few light numbers for contrast is all that you will need. Cue sheets can be obtained from the World exchange.

HOUSE OF GOLD, THE (Metro—Five Reels)—Theme—Moderato. Suggest "May Dreams"—Borch, "Berceuse"—Schytte, or "Robin's Farewell"—Arthur.

This is a society drama of great intensity. Dramatic music is needed with a few misteriosos and agitados. You will need an Hawaiian dance number, an Arabian dance, popular one-step, and a heavy pathetic selection. Note the wedding scene, and play with piano only according to action. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Metro exchange.

SANDY (Paramount—Five Reels)—Theme—Moderato and Scotch. Suggest "Charlie Is My Darling" or "Robin Adair."

This story takes place in the South, and deals with the old time chivalry of Kentucky. Naturally being in that blue grass country we have a fine horse race and considerable excitement. The first half of the picture will only stand a light setting, with a fast vivace for the race in the third reel. In the last reel we have an agitato and a shot fired. Do not use any Scotch music beside the theme, and stick to the Southern numbers to give contrast to your setting. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paramount exchange.

SOAP GIRL, THE (Vitagraph—Five Reels)—Theme—Allegretto. Suggest "Dance of the Moths"—Weidt, "Idilio"—Lack, or "The Merry Lark"—Bendix.

Light music only is needed for this modern comedy-drama. Waltzes, serenades, and Intermezzos will fit nicely. A couple of light operatic selections with judicious cutting would probably be appreciated, and you would have the chance to give your patrons some variety in musical settings by availing yourself of this opportunity. Note the piano to action effect in the first reel. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Vitagraph exchange.

STATION CONTENT (Triangle—Five Reels)—Theme—Allegretto. Suggest "In a Garden"—Sudds, "A Lovo Song"—Bartlett, or "Mignonette"—Friml.

This is a melodrama with intense scenes of daring sprinkled throughout. You will need some pathetic stuff, many gaops and hurrys, and a number suitable for a big storm scene. Railroad effect abound, as the entire story centers around railroad life. You will also need some popular two-steps to take care of the theatrical phase of the story. No cue sheets are available.

PEG OF THE PIRATES (Fox—Five Reels)—Theme—Allegro. Suggest "Tale of Two Hearts"—Roberts, "Tete-a-Tete"—De Koven, or "Vanity"—Jackson.

Open with "Down South," or a medley of Southern airs. In the second reel you will need an agitato to begin with followed by some very heavy dramatic music. The third reel is almost completely agitato, with the closing number a burlesque. During the fourth and fifth reels you will need some drum signals according to action and a big battle agitato. Finish the picture with "Wedding March Militaire." Cue sheets can be obtained from the Fox exchange.

WOMAN OF REDEMPTION, A (World Film—Five Reels)—Theme—Andantino. Suggest "Premier D'Aour"—Benolst, "Remembrance"—Telma, or "Serenade"—Czerwonsky.

The atmosphere of this picture is distinctly pastoral, taking the scenes of the Maine woods. The character is an emotional drama requiring rather heavy music. You will need a one-step, dramatic tension, furioso, misterioso, and heavy hurry. A little touch of French Canadian music would not be out of place, and would lend variety. Cue sheets can be obtained from the World exchange.

Leader's Service Bureau.

Questions Answered—Suggestions Offered.

Q. Do you believe in changing the traditional tempo of a number to suit the scenes?

A. Generally speaking, no; but if the scene is interrupted by a "flash back" of a few seconds the music might be retarded or hastened to fit the flash, returning to the original tempo to complete the scene.

Q. Who wrote "The Wanderer's" Song?

A. Tschalkowsky. This is one of the best of his few writings for voice.

Q. Will you kindly tell me what is meant by a "Morris Dance"? Do they dance it in this country? I saw the other day that one of Percy Grainger's compositions was called a "Morris Dance."

A. The original Morris Dance was a sort of pageant with dancing possibly derived from the Morisco, a Moorish dance formerly popular in Spain and France. But it may owe its origin to the Maticins, a French dance of men in armour of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. In accounts of the Morisco no mention is made of a sword dance, which is a distinguishing feature of the Maticins, and survived in the English Morris Dance (in a somewhat different form) so late as the nineteenth century. The English Morris Dance is said to have been introduced from Spain by John of Gaunt in the reign of Edward III, but this is extremely doubtful, as there are scarcely any traces of it before Henry VII, when it first began to be popular. It usually formed part of the May games, although it was not confined to any particular part of the year. The dresses were ornamented with bells. There is a country dance which goes by the name of Morris Dance which is frequently danced in the north of England. It is danced by Sir Roger de Coverley, any number of couples taking part. Each couple holds a ribbon between them under which the couples pass. The dance is known all through England, the different shires each having their own modifications. It is not danced in this country.

Q. I "fake" on the drums. Two or three times recently I have lost my jobs because I couldn't read. Where can I find a good teacher on drums in New York?

A. In these columns we are unable to give you any names and addresses, but if you will write us again giving us some more data regarding how much you wish to pay and what hours are convenient we shall be glad to put you in touch with an excellent teacher who is professionally engaged in picture playing.

Q. In playing an overture before my picture performance what length time would you suggest as being long enough and not too long to tire the average audience?

A. If you are playing a two-hour show and your orchestra isn't of large proportions we would suggest that you limit your overture to about eight minutes, never exceeding ten.

Piano "Preludes."

Many of us, in spite of our musicianship, have wondered why the great pianistic artists always strike a few solid chords before commencing their solos. We used to think they were "feeling out" the instrument or doing a "grand stand" play, but there seems to be a real reason for it.

Did you ever listen to a church clock striking far off? The first stroke came very faintly, but the succeeding ones were distinct and clear. The first stroke was in a dead atmosphere, and started it to vibrating so that succeeding strokes were clearly heard.

The same idea holds with a piano in a large hall. It is necessary to get the vibrations started, and for this purpose strong, forceful chords are needed, not a light, delicate prelude.

This explanation may provoke the long debatable facts regarding sound. Many scientists are inclined to believe that sound waves are conducted through materials instead of through air, but until proof has shown us differently we must still cling to the latter solution.

Co-operation.

THE caption to this department speaks truthfully but with brevity. It does not explain fully enough that this music page is conducted by us, for you and your best interests. THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD aims to give the best possible service to the exhibitor and cover every field in which he is interested. This page is yours. Your position in the picture industry is no longer that of a necessary evil. By individual and painstaking effort, supplemented by our music department, music has become a feature in the presentation of pictures. Together, we can make music the feature in the picture business, but the results to be obtained through individual effort cannot be as large and gratifying as those gained from co-operation in intelligent endeavor.

We have tried to present the art of picture setting in its many phases in leading articles intended to assist in solving the knotty problems of the leaders throughout the country. We have had many kind comments made upon them, but no constructive criticism. The former we like, but the latter would be more beneficial in that it would give us a line upon the thoughts of our readers that would make for greater endeavor and more lasting results. We cannot see all the problems that may arise in picture fitting, and the time has come when glittering generalities is not the nourishing food which the orchestra leader needs. Tell us your troubles and pass some of your burdens to our broad shoulders that we may lighten the load and encourage you in your work, which in many cases is so little appreciated.

Brother Mirsky, of Dubois, Pa., has been kind enough to say "It is indeed a pleasure to note the constant improvement in the Music Page of the 'World.' Can't you induce the boss to give you more space. The Leader's Service Bureau is a peach."

We thank brother Mirsky and assure him that the "boss" has promised more space in the fall. This tribute to our poor efforts is indeed encouraging.

A brother in Los Angeles writes: "We always read your pages with great interest and believe your music suggestions synopsis very helpful to all theaters."

We are always glad to hear words of praise from the balmy land of sunshine and will renew our efforts to create an interest that will become more widespread on the Pacific slope.

Even the theater managers have been generous in comment. Mr. G. R. Dettor, manager of Jefferson theater in Charlottesville, Va., writes "I have been a close reader of your music department and find it a great help and fully agree with you that an orchestra must consist of only first-class men."

Friend F. A. Mangan writes us a personal letter in which he says: "Your page in THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD is the only musical department upon which I can rely for adequate information for the music for the pictures. You show a fearlessness in your reviews which is highly commendable, and your clever hints for special effects have proved of great value." Mr. Managan is a picture-presenter of no mean ability and his opinion well worth while.

Friend S. R. Rothapfel in a letter of congratulation says "Keep up the good work." His praise means much to us as he really has created a standard of musical presentation which is followed by all live exhibitors.

Now all these kind words are pleasant to the ear and we are glad to get them, but we want more of them. It is estimated that there are 7,644 leaders in picture houses scattered throughout the country. We want to hear from 7,643, and an excuse from the other fellow that he will write when he gets better.

We want to know what your troubles are. We want to find out what kind of service you need the most, both from the producer and ourselves. We want you to use our good offices with the exhibitor if necessary. Tell us about your cue-sheets. Are you getting them regularly? Are they what you want in the way of musical service? How could the cue-sheet service be improved? Don't say to yourself that in spite of the difficulties that are constantly arising that you manage to make a living, so why kick about it. Have some consideration for your brother musician who may not be so adaptable to adverse conditions.

What about the new music question? Can we help you in that respect. We do not represent any publishing house and show no preference as to the class of music placed upon the market. If it can be used for pictures we care not who puts it out. We can neither be biased nor bought, so our judgment is based solely on the merits of the music submitted and your needs in picture setting. Let us be the medium of putting you in touch with the new pieces that are issued from time to time, a brief review of which you may have for the asking. If sufficient of my brethren ask for it we will give it space in this column?

Are you satisfied with your present position or do you yearn for wider worlds to conquer? It is not our intention to establish an agency for supply musicians to the theaters, but we do want to help those who through circumstances cannot help themselves. Don't forget that THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD officially recognizes the musicians who are to be found enlisted in the ranks of picture players.

Every orchestra leader, piano player or organist, who has charge of the music for a theater should be a subscriber of this publication. He owes it to himself to keep abreast of the times and know what things are being accomplished in the field of his chosen vocation. No longer can he afford to arrive a few minutes before the show begins, hurriedly gather together a few numbers which may be useful, play the bill in slipshod manner and hasten away immediately upon its conclusion. To get results he must be a student of the picture industry, searching it from every angle for those little touches that make an artistic presentation. He must learn what the "other fellow" is doing and how he is doing it. Self-satisfaction spells his downfall, and there is no longer room for the "bluffer."

We expect to make some changes in the policy of this department, not anything of the radical order, but merely adding some things that may make it more effective, and enlarging its scope for good. We want your co-operation in this matter and solicit your suggestions along the line of an improved service to you. Let us get together for the mutual benefit of all "movie" musicians. Don't wait for weeks to elapse but write us at once. Let July be flooded with mail for our perusal and consumption. We can assure you that our request is not an idle desire for your acquaintance. We do not want to know you, but our aim is to help you, with that sincerity of purpose that comes from one who, has been "through the mill" and knows its vicissitudes.

Music At the Strand.

During the week commencing June 23, the Strand theater offered an exceptionally good bill. Mr. Edel, the managing director, changed the routine of his numbers, which, we believe, enhanced the entire performance. Instead of beginning his show with the usual overture the orchestra played a prelude of a few minutes duration and segued immediately into the pictorial review. The music chosen for this number was, as always, very appropriate. Special mention must be made of the selection played during the scenes showing our aviators. The time-worn march was eliminated, and a trippy bird-like piece substituted. Nothing could have been more suitable.

The third number offered was programmed as an exclusive war scoop, showing the rousing reception of our Camp Upton boys when they arrived in England. Let us first tell you about the clever setting of this film, at the same time, passing for the present, the opening of it. When the Highlanders appeared with their bag-pipes the orchestra created one of the best imitations of those skirling instruments that we have ever heard. Nor did they carry this strain too long. It was a simple suggestion without the monotony which would have been brought forth had they played it throughout the scene. The trumpet calls for "fall in" and "prepare to march" were beautifully synchronized, as was the fife and drum solo, when they played "The Girl I Left Behind Me" as the veterans marched into view. Every little detail showed care and great thought.

The scenic received the best possible musical interpretation, and was thoroughly enjoyed.

Miss Cora Tracey, a newcomer, showed one of the most remarkable contralto voices in her rendition of two song numbers. "A Spirit Flower" was most artistically done, well enunciated, and with perfect breath control. Miss Tracey's voice is well placed, and her bridging is unnoticeable to that extent which forces one to believe in one register. Her entire scale is smooth and well balanced, and her richness of quality is a delight. We do not happen to be privileged with her acquaintance, but predict for her a merited success.

Her second number, "Somewhere a Voice Is Calling," was enhanced by a fine setting showing the tents of our soldier boys in the gathering dusk. The house lights were dimmed and a spot thrown upon the singer. Gradually the late evening glow faded as the singer progressed with her selection until at the close of the song night had enfolded in her mantle of darkness the bivouacs of the soldiers. This made a decidedly strong impression.

The feature, "Her Final Reckoning," with Pauline Fredericks, received a musical setting that we were proud of, and those who were responsible for it could be proud of it too, for it FITTED. The fitting of the Gypsy scenes were especially good, and the use of Chopin's Nocturne was an inspiration. Another of those little pizzicato effects played by strings was effective in conveying the idea of the guitar played in the picture by Count Menko. This selection was synchronized to a nicety and made the scene live. Mr. Relser conducted the feature, and we liked his well marked beat. In his over-anxiety to catch the cues he sometimes chops off the music before a cadence or natural ending of the phrase, but experience will eliminate this fault in an otherwise good director.

During the wedding scene the organist played both Wedding Marches of German origin. Fundamentally and from the picture presentation standpoint he was right, but in view of the strong feeling against German music it is good judgment to refrain from bringing into the atmosphere an antagonistic thought.

The overture, "Madame Butterfly," by Puccini, was directed by Oscar Spireseu in a musicianly manner and with a broad interpretation that was pleasing.

"Madame Butterfly," an opera in two acts, music by G. Puccini. This opera, which from the first aroused the keenest interest among opera-goers, has become an enduring success. The original Metropolitan production in Italian was under the personal direction of Puccini himself, who refined and beautified it according to his own ideas into one of the most finished operas ever produced here.

The story of the drama is familiar to all through John Luther Long's narrative and the Belasco dramatic version. The tale is the old one of the passing fancy of a man for a woman, and her faithfulness even unto death, which comes by her own hand when she finds herself abandoned.

Puccini has completely identified his music with the sentiments and sorrows of the characters in John Luther Long's drama, and has accompanied the pictorial beauty of the various scenes with a setting of incomparable loveliness. Rarely has picturesque action been more completely wedded to beautiful music.

The setting and the lighting effects that went with this overture was typical of the Strand. Mr. Harold Edel has developed this part of entertainment to a high plane, and no pains are spared to make it the hall mark of this national institution.

Musical Suggestion Synopsis.

ANNEXING BILL (Pathe—Five Reels)—No Theme Necessary.

The music for this picture should be only moderately heavy, and some slow waltzes will be found very effective. Note the two dancing scenes in the first reel and see that your light selection be properly synchronized. The first dancing scene is followed by the depiction of an old man playing a violin. Here you should use a violin solo without any accompaniment whatsoever. Then you will find the second dancing scene following immediately after. This is the only tricky part of the feature, but if accurately gauged you will obtain excellent results. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Pathe exchange.

ACE HIGH (Fox—Five Reels)—Theme—Slow Moderato. Suggest "Land of Dreams"—Driffil, "Canzonetta"—Nicode, or "Melodie"—Friml.

This picture deals with the Canadian Mounted Police, and is rich in pastoral effects. You will need some agitated, a couple of fox-trots, and a one-step (preferably of a Mexican character). There is an opportunity to use a short American Indian theme to depict the squaw. It would lend variety and be appreciated by your audience, for she is a lovable character. You will also need some fast allegros or galops to fit the chase scenes. The balance of the picture should be heavy dramatics. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Fox exchange.

CLAW, THE (Select—Six Reels)—Theme—Andantino. Suggest "May Dreams"—Borch, "Enchanted Hour"—Moutou, or "Reverie"—Doonhof.

This feature will give you some trouble. The atmosphere is largely African, and as there is a dearth of distinctive savage music you may be forced to requisition some Oriental stuff. Get all the African music you can to make the setting real. Long numbers will fit nicely, as the scenes are quite lengthy and the few flash-backs do not occasion any difficulty. You will find excellent material in "Three African Dances," "Coconut Dance," by Herman; "African 400," by Roberts, "Vision of Salome," by Joyce, and "The Arab's Dream," by Kendall. The cue sheet supplied for this picture can well and easily be improved upon by careful selection. The tempo can be depended upon to guide you, and these found in atmospheric numbers will give you a good setting. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Select exchange.

FAIR PRETENDER, THE (Goldwyn—Five Reels)—Theme—Allegretto. Suggest "Dawn of Love"—Bendix, "Canzonetta"—Godard, or "Meditation"—Cuzenza.

The picture has some dramatic values that must be carefully taken musically. It opens with light stuff, gradually working up to its climax in the fourth reel. You will need some misteriosos, dramatic tensions, a couple of popular fox-trots, and a one-step. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Goldwyn exchange.

FIREFLY OF FRANCE, THE (Paramount—Five Reels)—Theme—Andante. Suggest ? ? ? ?

It would be well to open this picture with the "Marsellaise" to establish the French atmosphere. Light music will follow, and good judgment would dictate those of French origin if possible. Use Bizet, Chaminade, Balloz, Massenet, and Chopin if possible. During the last two reels you will need considerable dramatic stuff, agitated, and a battle hurry. Close with either the theme or the "Marsellaise." Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paramount exchange.

GIRL IN HIS HOUSE, THE (Vitagraph—Five Reels)—Theme—Moderato. Suggest "Serenade"—Chaminade, "Serenade"—Widor, or "Whispering Willows"—Herbert.

The character of this picture is a modern society drama with American atmosphere. The music necessary will consist of light stuff intermingled with a misterioso dramatico and an honest-to-goodness misterioso. Note the possibilities in the reception scene, where you may use a violin solo with splendid effect. Watch for the shot after Doris gets the gun. A railroad effect can be worked providing you do not overdo it. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Vitagraph exchange.

HER FINAL RECKONING (Paramount—Five Reels)—Theme—Andante. Suggest "Nocturne"—Karganoff, "Romance in F."—Tschaikowski, or "Three Songs from Eliland"—Von Flietz.

Here is a grand opportunity afforded for a big musical setting. The atmosphere is English, with a touch of Gypsy. The picture opens dramatically blending into the pathetic. After what you might call the prologue we are introduced to the Gypsy life of the young heroine. Here you have a chance to use a violin solo taking as your subject a weird Hungarian melody or one of Dvorak's masterpieces. At the proposal of the prince, which is shown in the garden scene, you may begin the Nocturne of Chopin in C minor. This long number will bring you through the dramatic meeting of Count Menko and our heroine, and it will fit every foot of the film. As Count Menko relates their former meeting the strings should play a Venetian Love song, pizzicato, to imitate the guitar with which he is seen accompanying himself. Do not play the Wedding March during the marriage between the prince and our heroine. Use a strong processional instead. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paramount exchange.

MAN'S WORLD, A (Metro—Five Reels)—Theme—Andantino. Suggest "Gardenia"—Densmore, "Serenade"—Strube, or "Love Song"—Powell.

Here you have an emotional modern drama with French and American atmosphere. Open with the theme, and follow up with some light French stuff. During this picture you may use violin and piano solos to splendid advantage. In the fourth and fifth reel you will require some heavy dramatic numbers, and not in the French style. Be sure to mark the contrast in your music when the location is changed. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Metro exchange.

SHARK MONROE (Paramount—Five Reels)—Theme—Andante. Suggest "My Dreams"—Lee, "Longing"—Armand, or "Regrets D'Amour"—Bright.

This is the tale of the Klondike country, a story of the gambling gamer, sodden sots, and rough ruffians. You will need some pastoral music, some pathos numbers, and a few dramatic tensions. Have a two-step ready for the dance hall scene. You will require a furioso in the first reel and a big agitato in the last reel. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paramount exchange.

WE CAN'T HAVE EVERYTHING (Paramount—Five Reels)—Theme unnecessary.

Light music is what you will need for this picture. Select numbers with lots of pep to them. No special atmosphere or effects are prevalent, and the only suggestion which might be helpful is the wedding scene at the close of the picture. The cue sheet suggests "Over There," but we think this is over-done. Play a processional march as a fitting finish and a suitable selection to the scene. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paramount exchange.

New Firm to Handle Picture Music.

Recently a charter was granted to the Belwin, Inc., New York City, to conduct theatrical and motion picture enterprises and publish music; capitalized for $12,000, with the directors named as Sol. P. Levy, Charles Hollender, and S. M. Berg.

S. P. Levy and S. M. Berg have for a long time been intimately acquainted with the picture game of music, and their publications has been widely used in the setting of features. The amalgamation should be ideal from many standpoints. It will mean the joining of both catalogues under a single hand, which will make it loom larger for picture use. Mr. Levy's excellent arrangements will find a wide field in the original ideas of Mr. Berg, and together they should make a fine team. These gentlemen know exactly the needs of the orchestral leader, and are qualified in every respect to supply those needs. The editor of this department extends his good wishes for their joint venture, and sincerely hopes that they will continue to keep the standard of their works upon the high planes of legitimate art.

Questions Answered—Suggestions Offered.

Q. A certain producing company has discontinued the distribution of cue sheets, and I am lost without them. I have taken the matter up with my employer, and he has promised to write them for the music service which we have been accustomed to get. Can you suggest a temporary remedy?

A. Since you were good enough to add the name of the company in a P. S. we shall personally call upon them and urge the necessity of the service. In the mean time if you will send us a list of your pictures which you expect to play we shall be pleased to give you a little idea of what you will need in the way of music. We feel sure that no company releasing pictures on a regular program can afford to neglect the orchestras of the exhibitors.

Q. I am a lady saxophone player, and desire to learn to play the clarinet, with a view to playing in a picture theater orchestra. Is it hard to learn, and where can I procure suitable training?

A. Having played the saxophone you naturally read fairly well, and your knowledge of fingering will prove helpful. Of course, the fingering of a clarinet is entirely different, and may be confusing at the start. If you will write to C. H. Ditson & Co., Carl Fischer, or G. Schirmer, Inc., all of New York, they will be pleased to send you a list of text books treating with the playing of the clarinet. Study these well yourself. Practice the exercises therein, and when you have mastered the rudiments secure a good teacher. Whatever you do be sure to get a thorough grounding before trying to appear in public professionally.

The Proper Presentation of Pictures Musically—Natural and Unnatural Endings.

NOTHING gives the finish to an orchestral setting like clear endings and clean attacks. And on the other hand, nothing tries the patience of the patrons so sorely as the chopping off of the music in the middle of a measure and commencing the new number in an extraneous key. The science of picture fitting has advanced materially in this respect, and almost all large orchestras and many of the smaller combinations make it a point to segue without a perceptible break.

When the picture is accompanied by a special musical score there should be no interruption and few endings in the playing of it providing the arranger knew what he was doing. Key sequence is usually followed with suitable modulations to join non-related keys. The score provides the only adequate musical setting from the standpoint of perfect continuity.

It is nearly impossible to select music suitable for certain scenes and at the same time with key sequence when those numbers must be picked from a published library. There is sure to be a clashing of in-harmonious keys upon the change of scenes unless the piece be accurately timed to finish on a given phrase which has a cadence relative to the following number. Accurate timing depends largely upon the operator's speed of projection, and frequently the labors of the musical director are lost through the careless manipulation of the operating machine.

Sometimes the characteristic tempo of a selection is changed to fit the duration of the scene. This is musical distortion of the worst kind, and should be frowned upon by all those who profess a true love of the art of music.

Recently a musical director was called upon to fit a feature hurriedly, and, with a supercilious bravado, exclaimed, "It is no trouble to fit pictures. Pick out any old number and play it according to the action and tempo of your picture." We wonder how he would adjust a Spanish habanera to an interior scene showing a fond mother putting her child to bed.

We know some leaders that time every item in their library as they buy it, marking the duration in minutes and seconds upon the outside of the piano cover. This is a good practice and wonderfully helpful in picture setting if you do not select your music from the standpoint of time only. Its adaptability and appropriateness must first be considered. The tendency is to pick out a number perhaps a half minute short and make it fit by dragging. This is an insult to the composer, and an affront to the musicians who are to be found in your audience.

To consider your cue is important, but it should not take precedence over a smooth change of music. It is always better to over-run the cue in finding a phrase upon which you can finish on the cadence than to sacrifice continuity and outrage the ears of your auditors by an abrupt break. A cadence frequently suggests itself as a possible ending just before a cue appears. If it be taken and held, with a slow diminuendo and the succeeding number be picked up pp, it gives a smoothness that detracts nothing from the picture.

The leaders of some of the smaller orchestral combinations have trained their players to finish on the tonic chord of every selection and make them hold it until the signal is given to start the new one. As the cue to change draws near the leader taps his music rack, which indicates that he is about to finish the number. He slows up the tempo, and as he comes to the end of the phrase he signals the orchestra to cut to the last chord. The only objection to this method is the tapping of the music rack. The sharp staccato sound thus made is a greater screen detractor than a bad segue, so that, although he effects a smooth change, he defeats the primary purpose intended. However, this mode of procedure is to be highly recommended if the tapping can be eliminated.

There is yet another way to gain smoothness of sequence in picture setting which, so far as we have been informed, has not been tried. We claim it as a child of our brain, and offer it as a suggestion to those theaters that have large and somewhat unwieldy orchestras. It cannot be used effectively with every number because of the possibility of monotony, but when occasion arises to use such selections as "Liebestod," excerpts from "Parsival," "Othello," or parts of large suites or symphonies (where there is no stopping place) the plan might be found of some value.

The idea consists of a series of original endings, eight or sixteen measures in length, and written without any definite melody, but based solely on a chord construction which would fit into almost any number of the same or relative key. The best results could be obtained from three forms, viz; arpeggio, sustained chords, or color figures, with possible pauses.

Fig. 1, as shown below, will give an idea of the arpeggio form of an eight bar phrase (the last bar being omitted to conserve space) which could be used with any number, allegretto in character, and in the keys of D maj., G maj., or A maj. It would also be possible to attach it to one written in B minor if care were used in connecting the selection proper with the proposed ending.

You will note the excellence of the bass progression, as well as the neutral figure which serves as a melody. With a rall towards the finish this ending can be made most adaptable. Of course this piano illustration would be arranged for orchestra, and should receive a number for filing purposes. Although marked Allegretto tempo it could be used to finish pieces marked Andantino, Moderato or Andante Con Moto. Its parts should appear similar to Fig. 2, and should be pinned or attached to the phrase at a point where the leader expects to finish. Although the melody figures might not remotely resemble that found in the original ending the finale would be decent and complete.

The sustained chord formation can be utilized in much the same manner, but the writer's ingenuity will be taxed heavier to accomplish a truly musical phrase. The third form, which we have called color figures—for the want of something better—is probably the most effective and by all means the easiest to evolve, as can be seen by analyzing Fig. 3. This form can be made doubly effective when written for a special piece of music, such as Schubert's Unfinished Symphony. Here you find the dominant melody figure as shown in Fig. 4, can be used as the basis of Fig. 5, and attached to almost any part of this number, making a suitable ending.

The "Liebestod" of Wagner is another excellent example to experiment upon. How effective an original ending based upon the thematic treatment of this piece would prove! Frequently your scene forces you to stop at the letter N, which is a bad break requiring a finale to make a clean segue. If you used "Liebestod" again for another feature, you might only have time to play to the letter H, and again your original finish would prove valuable.

We realize that this plan entails a lot of extra work on the part of the leader or his librarian, but if the endings are written as required from time to time, it is astonishing how soon you will have an adequate collection, ready for instant use. The strongest point of a good musical setting is the proper joining together of individual numbers which go to make it up. Every effort should be made to construct and direct the setting so that there is no perceptible break throughout the entire picture. To accomplish this you gain the first sixty per cent. of merit in the proper presentation of pictures musically.

Music at the Rialto.

During the week of June 30 Mr. S. L. Rothapel offered one of the biggest bills for the money that we have seen in New York Picturedom. It was not that there were more numbers than usual, but each number stood out as a feature in itself and at the same time blended so well into a composite whole. Mr. Rothapel is only human and is prone to err once in a while, but when he gives us a programme of such excellence he is instantly forgiven for those little sins of omission and commission.

The Overture—Capriccio Italien by Tschalkowski—was beautifully rendered by the Rialto Symphony Orchestra under the direction of the incomparable Ilugo Relsenfeld. Mr. Relsenfeld knows this number by heart and gets out of it everything obtainable.

Then followed the scenic showing the Island of Cuba in all its picturesqueness. The music selected for this was of Spanish atmosphere and made you feel as if you were actually present among the palms and the quaint people of the Cuban Isle.

Miss Annie Rosner followed with an aria from "La Forza Del Destino." This opera of Verdi's is seldom heard though it merits a prominent place in the galaxy of famed works. Miss Rosner showed to excellent advantage in this number. She is gaining poise, and never have we heard better vocalization from this talented singer. The selection of this solo was a happy one, as it linked the scenic with the Animated Weekly, which dealt so much with the Italian troops and their good works. Mr. Rothapel divided his Weekly into A and B numbers showing the "Fighting Along the Plave."

These pictures were taken by the official cinematographers of the Royal Italian Army in a territory along the Plave River, where the Italians have just inflicted such a crushing defeat upon the Austrian forces. They are shown here through the courtesy of the Italo-North-American-Commercial Union, official agents for the Italian government.

Carrying out the Italian idea, "La Donna e Mobile" from Rigoletto was well sung by Carlos Mejla. This young man is new to us, but his stage presence and perfect breath control carried the audience by storm. His voice is light, but very sweet, and the easy manner which he uses is distinctly pleasing.

The feature called "The Claws of the Hun" was well played, principally by the organist. Our friend Arthur Depew officiated at the console, and any picture is in good hands when he has charge of it. The Victrola, playing "Over There" from back stage, was admirably timed and worked out in exact synchrony. This is a new development in picture playing that is fast coming to the fore as a pleasing innovation.

Selections from "Miss Springtime" were played as an Entr'acte with brother Finston wielding the baton. His predilection is to dynamic effects, which spoil his musicianship and distorts his interpretation. There is enough noise in the pictorial without dragging it into a spot where it does not belong. Tempo should be well defined at the beginning of each new movement, not four measures afterwards.

The comedy and the organ solo closed the show.

American Federation of Musicians.

The American Federation of Musicians held their twenty-third annual convention in Chicago recently, when the constitution, by-laws, and standing resolutions were amended and ratified by that body. Commencing May 13 and lasting a week it was in all respects and from all angles the most successful, the most important, and the most beneficial of all previous conventions. This was not surprising, as the Chicago convention had the benefit of the experience gained in the twenty-two which preceded it.

No time was wasted in useless parliamentary camouflage nor was debate needlessly restricted; every delegate had a full and fair opportunity to express his views on any subject or question brought up. Much of the splendid work of the convention, from the practical viewpoint, was due to the masterful handling of the routine by the presiding officer.

Lieut. John Phillip Sausa was present with a consolidated band of five hundred instrumentalists and assisted at the flag raising which took place on the lake front. He was cheered to the echo when the band started "The Star Spangled Banner" as Old Glory was unfurled to the breeze. The twenty thousand people present, reverently and with uncovered heads, joined in singing the national anthem. The sight was indeed inspiring, and showed the true patriotic feeling which prevailed in that immense assemblage.

Year by year the A. F. of M. is moving forward in progressive lines and eliminating the dead wood which clutters up the machinery of adequate service. Those laws that have stood the test of time and experiment are retained. New resolutions are adopted that fit new conditions that arise from time to time. It is not the intention of the A. F. of M. to regard their laws as did the Medes and Persians. So many exigencies arise that must be handled by the local board of directors that wide scope is given to the discretion of the executive heads. But when a ruling is asked for, many times throughout the country, the national committee puts it into resolution form to be voted into the constitution if deemed advisable.

Never before has there been that oneness of purpose that so marked the proceedings of the twenty-third convention, and never before has the future held so many promising good things for the American Federation of Musicians.

Musical Suggestion Synopsis.

LET'S GET A DIVORCE (Paramount—Five Reels)—Theme—Moderato. Suggest "I'll Think of You" from "The Rainbow Girl" by Hirsch, "Chiffonette"—Atbernton or "Baby Sweetheart's Serenade"—Corri.

The picture is somewhat light, but you will need a hurry in the first reel. Sweet music will be most appropriate and you will have a chance to use Tosti's "Good-bye" if you deem it advisable, to couple this number filled with so many varied associations, with the scene beginning at the cue "T—But Spring Cannot Last." Close the picture with the theme. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paramount Exchange.

NEIGHBORS (World Film—Five Reels)—Theme—Valse Lento. Suggest "Innamorata"—Marcbetli, "Dodola"—Frey, or "The Way of Love"—Cremlieux.

This is an amusing comedy drama with a New England atmosphere. The opening is very sad, but beginning with the "T—The End of School Days," light music can be used to contrast the gloomy opening. You will need a popular Two-step and a joyous Allegro. There are some children scenes that require close attention, for your music being generally light will present difficulties in properly portraying them. Cue sheets can be obtained from the World Film Exchange.

SAY, YOUNG FELLOW (Paramount—Five Reels)—Theme unnecessary. This is one of the usual fire and dash comedies of Douglas Fairbanks fame. He does the usual hair-raising stunts and the action is fast throughout. Light music will be required with some special numbers that are almost direct cues. In the second reel you will need either "School Days" by Edwards or "I Can't Do that Sum" from Victor Herbert's "Babes in Toyland." Fairbanks has a habit of whistling "Believe Me, If All Those Endearing Young Charms," which occurs in the second and third reels. It is suggested that the orchestra stop playing and allow the piccolo to play it as a solo, synchronizing it to the screen action. You will also need a misterioso, a hurry and an agitato to meet the picture demands. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paramount Exchange.

TANGLED LIVES (Vitagraph—Five Reels)—Theme—Andante Pathetic. Suggest "Silent Sorrows"—Borch, "Elysium"—Speaks, or "Evensong"—Martin.

The character of this picture is an emotional drama dealing with the eternal triangle. It shows us the home life of the wealthy and also gives us a glimpse into the scientist's laboratory. Open with the theme. Follow up with a valse lento and continue into a pastorale number. The music should be kept light until the third reel, when some dramatic music is needed, followed by a misterioso. You will need a storm furioso and a dramatic agitato. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Vitagraph Exchange.

TINSEL (World—Five Reels)—Theme—Moderato Pastorale. Suggest "Mountain Song"—Borch, "Pastel Menuet"—Paradis, or "Whispering Willows"—Herbert.

This is a society drama with scenes of action in the homes of the wealthy. Open with the theme followed by a light Intermezzo. You will then require a sad number, followed by a gavotte. From this point the music follows in light treatment until the beginning of the third reel when you will need some dramatic stuff. The last reel is intensely sad and a long pathetic would play it nicely. Cue sheets can be obtained from the World Film Exchange.

VAMP, THE (Paramount—Five Reels)—Theme—Moderato Gracioso. Suggest "Tulips"—Miles, "Basket of Roses"—Abers, or "Bowl of Panles"—Reynard.

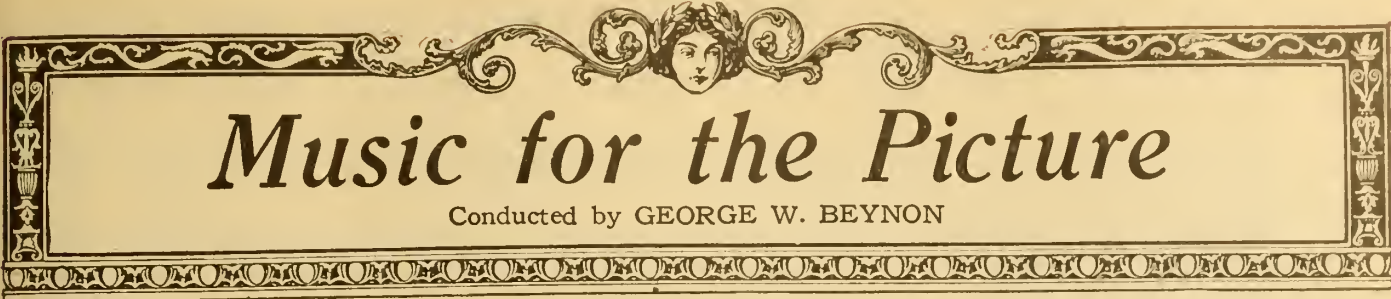

This picture is a light drama and will not need too much heavy music. The atmosphere in parts is Irish and you will find room for an Irish love song and a typical jig. There is also a march necessary, and we would suggest "Perishing's March" or "Over There." Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paramount Exchange.

Q. What is meant by "Unit" organ?

A. This is a name given to a class of organ put out by the Hope-Jones Manufacturing Co. Its registers are divided into classes which they speak of as "Units," and thus the name. It is regarded as their best instrument.

Notice.

QUESTIONS regarding music, addressed to this department, will receive a carbon copy of the department's reply by mail, when 4 cents are enclosed. Special replies by mail on matter which can not be answered in this column $1.00.

Let's Sing!

THROUGHOUT the length and breadth of this great land there is a wave of enthusiasm spreading for what is called community singing. Wherever one goes, in hamlet, village and city, one finds the people gathering together to lift their voices in song. The army and navy have taken it up because they have found that song gives inspiration, and inspiration means deeds of valor. During these depressing times people need the good cheer of music.

There is a peculiarity of the American nation probably not found in any other country. We have an abundance of patriotic hymns, yet not one in a thousand can sing them correctly. All know the "tune," but few have memorized the words. We la-di-da them, getting in a word here and there, and sing the melody lustily because we know that the song is something about America. There are a few gifted singers who really know the first verse of THE STAR SPANGLED BANNER, AMERICA, and perhaps THE BATTLE HYMN OF THE REPUBLIC, but if called upon to sing further they would be forced to confess their ignorance.

There is nothing so inspiring as the singing of our national airs by a large congregation of people who understand what they are singing about. Nothing draws them so close together in their communal interests nor so strengthens their unity of purpose to make the world "safe for democracy." The lyrics of these songs are just as inspiring as the melodies, and every citizen and citizeness should know them by heart.

WHAT BETTER PLACE FOR COMMUNITY SINGING OF PATRIOTIC SONGS THAN THE PICTURE THEATERS? (Grand pause for breath—and effect.) Gentlemen, be seated. There is no cause for alarm nor is the building on fire. Startling as the question may seem its affirmative answer is practicable, feasible, and much to be desired.

Let the exhibitor get slides printed with the first three verses of THE STAR SPANGLED BANNER, four verses of AMERICA, three of COLUMBIA, THE GEM OF THE OCEAN, three of the BATTLE HYMN, and two of the MARSEILLAISE. Let one song be sung by the audience each night, or each performance, as he may decide, and it will not be long before the American people will know these well enough to sing them when occasion gives opportunity for their use. The picture theater is well equipped for this wonderful, educational project. The congregation is self supplied, the orchestra or organ will play the accompaniment, and the only additional expense will be purely nominal in procuring the necessary slides. Little time will be taken in the singing of one number, and it should not seriously break into the theater schedule.

There are many reasons why motion picture theaters should take up the suggestion. In the first place your people will like it. It may be necessary at first to obtain the services of a professional singer to lead them, as there seems to prevail a timidity among the laity to show their vocal accomplishments in public. Notwithstanding this fact, they will enjoy it, and praise the patriotism which prompts it. In the second place, it will add yet another laurel wreath to the head of the fifth industry because of its musical educational facilities. The picture theater has played no small part in bringing to the masses who love music all the works of the masters rendered in a musicianly manner by the best possible means. This has already borne fruit by creating a deeper appreciation for the better class of music. Why not teach them our national songs?

Another and perhaps the strongest reason for adopting the suggestion lies in its patriotic appeal. In a few weeks we will again be called upon to subscribe to the Fourth Liberty Loan. As heretofore, the motion picture industry will be counted upon to give its strong support to the movement, and we believe that the inspiration of song can be made productive in dollars freely pledged. Multitudes everywhere singing together the songs of their forefathers, songs which breathe confidence and victory, will bring that hearty response which means death to the Kaiser.

Aside from the standpoint of the innovation and placing in the background for the present the patriotic appeal the community aspect of the plan looms up largely. The neighborhood house will find that it will entrench itself strongly in the hearts of its clientele by giving them the opportunity of getting together in song. For the few minutes required to sing a patriotic song the theater virtually is turned over to the people for amusement, relaxation, and education. They take part in the exercises of the day, and become an integral part of the performance. Humanity is the same the world over, and everybody likes to be an actor in the show.

The theaters in the villages and smaller towns will find a ready response to the new plan of community singing, and may find it advantageous to carry it further, introducing other forms of folk-songs.

The large picture houses in cities dependent upon a transient trade will obtain the best results by securing an amateur choir of voices to lead the singing. This should not entail any additional expense, for singers are always glad to have the opportunity of performing a patriotic duty. There is no limit to what might be done with the assistance of trained voices. They have a box office value that cannot be overlooked.

We have no desire to turn the picture theater into a concert hall, and feel that the suggestion of community singing is not incompatible with the screen. The showing of pictures has gotten beyond the point of merely offering funny subjects to draw forth laughter. It has a mission which comprises art, entertainment, humor, news, and education. The screen is a perfect blackboard for the teaching of any subject, and should be utilized in a project that is national and patriotic, with the added virtue of being altruistic.

Musical Suggestion Synopsis.

CLAWS OF THE HUN, THE (Paramount—Five Reels)—Theme—Moderato. Suggest "Legend"—Friml, "Serenade"—Widor, or "Romance"—Mericanto.

This is a patriotic film which must be fitted with short, snappy numbers and strong with love of country. The first reel will need only light serenade stuff. At the "T. Carl Von Helm" a fearsome and harsh number should be used emblematic of our hatred for the Huns. Note the direct cue for "Over There," which should be played by a phonograph stationed behind scenes to gain effectiveness, and you will need the same selection to close the picture with. Watch for the auto crash in the fourth reel, and the big fight culminating in the shooting at the close of the picture. You will need some pathetic music to fit the mother scenes of this picture, and we would suggest "Mother," by Romberg, as one most suitable to the atmosphere. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paramount exchange.

EVERYWOMAN'S HUSBAND (Triangle—Five Reels)—Theme for mother or Edith—Moderato. Suggest "Martinique"—Lorraine, "Amaranthus"—Gilder, or "Imaginary"—Ballet No. 3.

This picture is a character modern drama dealing with the illicit love of married men for women—not their wives. Long numbers will be needed to give this picture a smooth setting. Few agitatos are wanted, but there should be an undercurrent of mystery running throughout the entire setting. Note the fight coming in the end of the picture, and use a big excerpt from one of the operas. The prelude from Romeo and Juliette is recommended. Light numbers will be effective during the scenes with Della Marshall, and we would suggest as a theme for her "The Vampire," by Sol Levi. This music is most appropriate for "vamps" of all descriptions. No cue sheets are available, and for that reason it would be well to get a pre-viewing if possible.

EMPTY CAB, THE (Bluebird—Five Reels)—Theme—Allegro. Suggest "La Caresse"—Hemberger, "Tale of Two Hearts"—Roberts, or "Tete-a-Tete"—De Koven.

This is a mystery story with all the action in the world. You will need the usual consistent misteriosos, many hurries, some dramatic tension stuff, and the average number of light "fillers." Do not bear too strongly on the theme aspect of the picture, but select only those moments in which the hero in the foreground is putting over something big. To close the picture use a number denoting triumph to signify the culmination of his hazardous exploits. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Universal exchange.

FINGER OF JUSTICE, THE (Arrow Film Co.—Seven Reels)—Theme for Betty—Allegretto. Suggest "Sweetheart Baby's Serenade"—Corri, or "The Merry Lark"—Bendix.

This picture is a big propaganda film that requires a theme for almost every character to bring out the contrasts throughout the feature. There has been arranged an admirable music score for it, and every leader should request his manager to get it for him. He will find that the synchrony is perfect, and the difficulties, which, under a musical setting adaptation would be almost impossible, have been well handled. If you cannot get the score insist on a pre-viewing of this picture, as it will be out of the question to fit it properly otherwise. Scores can be obtained from the Arrow Film Co.

GHOST OF ROSY TAYLOR, THE (American—Five Reels)—Theme—Andante. Suggest "Extase"—Ganne, "Herd Girl's Dream"—Lubitsky, or "Narcissus"—Nevin.

This is one of those homely little features that has so much heart interest that sweet music must predominate. There is a change of atmosphere from France to America, which should be carefully noted and the contrast marked. The early part of the picture is very pathetic, and sorrow must be portrayed by long selections. You can play this feature without recourse to any of the photoplay series. Good, solid music is what you will find most effective. Cue sheets can be obtained from the American exchange.

GOOD LOSER, A (Triangle—Five Reels)—Theme for the heroine—Andante. Suggest "Dialogue"—Meyer-Helmud, "Arioso"—Frey, or "Heart's Desire"—Losey.

There is virility in this photoplay, and it must be brought out in the music. You will also need some pathetic stuff of a not too saccharine nature. Dramatic tensions can be used to advantage, and you will note the dramatic finish, the fight, pistol shots, and agitation. A good suggestion is the use of the violin in solos whenever Jack Monroe needs a theme. This will be found most effective and relief from the usual form of musical setting. As there are no cue sheets available it would be wise to request a pre-view of this picture to gain the proper prospective.

NO MAN'S LAND (Metro—Five Reels)—Theme for Katherine—Valse Lento. Suggest "Heartstrings"—Vecsey, "Valse Chic"—Russel, or "Sunset in Eden"—Hall.

Here you have a picture dealing really in three atmospheres, American, German, and Chinese. The last is merely incidental, and you may not regard it as vital in the picture setting, but the first two should certainly be considered. The feature is intensely dramatic, and big stuff will be required almost entirely. Note the shooting during the card game, and the fight between the Chlaaman and the hero. You will require some misterlosos, a couple of big hurrys, and some agitados of the heavier variety. Toward the finish you will have an opportunity to use some patriotic song of American origin—preferably, "Columbia, the Gem of the Ocean." Cue sheets can be obtained from the Metro exchange.

OPPORTUNITY (Metro—Five Reels)—Theme—Allegretto. Suggest "Caressing Butterfly"—Barthelme, "Legend of a Rose"—Reyard, or "Moonlight Dance"—Flnck.

This is a comedy-drama with lots of light stuff needed. There is a big fight scene which becomes a melee, and will require some fast allegro agitato. You will need a couple of two-steps and some popular waltzes. Make your predominate feature of this setting a light airiness which will in no way lead to serious thought. It is essentially an entertaining picture, and heavy stuff would be out of place. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Metro exchange.

ONE THOUSAND DOLLARS (Vitagraph)—Theme—Moderato. Suggest "Cannonetta"—Nicode, "The Flatterer"—Chamlnade, or "Romance"—Merlianto.

Sweet music is what you will need for this feature. It has no great dramatic value, but is filled with heart throbbing stuff that must be strongly portrayed by the music. You will need no hurrys, etc., and it would be wise to stick to simple melodies principally denoting love. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Vitagraph exchange.

OTHER MEN'S DAUGHTERS (Fox—Five Reels)—Theme—Andante. Suggest "Roma"—Edwards, "Souvenir"—Geehl, or "To a Star"—Leonard.

This feature is intensely dramatic, and calls for big stuff in the line of music. Opening quietly with music suitable to a convent scene the picture carries us rapidly to a gay party held in the studio of the father of the heroine. Here you will need a two-step, and possibly a garish dance number would be more suitable. From that point the picture becomes very dramatic, and the following events are thrilling and filled with action. Use long numbers of the heavier type, and see that they keep a smooth evenness in order that the attention of the patrons will not be detracted during the interesting portion of the picture. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Fox exchange.

Questions Answered—Suggestions Offered.

Q. In playing song orchestrations on the repeat where no D. S. or D. C. is given would you go back to the introduction or start again at the beginning of the verse?

A. In playing pictures it is always wise to omit all introductions. It gives more facility in segueing, and keeps the music more even. The introductions to song arrangements should never be played more than the first time, if at all. When you have played the number through make your repeat back to the beginning of the verse proper.

Q. Why do you consider organ accompaniments inappropriate for comedies?

A. The organ is a serious instrument noted mainly for its grandeur of quality and its depth of feeling. Its registers do not contain tones suitable to the frivolous music necessary in playing comedies. Speed is not one of the strong features of the playing of the instrument, and in order to "get over" the funny stuff many galops are frequently required. This class of music does not sound well from the organ. There are orchestral organs manufactured specially for picture playing that have all the necessary traps and special units for comedy playing. These meet every requirement needed for "funny" music.

Q. I have added "Educationals" to my program. What style of music do you consider best suited for them?

A. The old way of fitting scenic is passe. Waltzes no longer are found adequate. If you will turn to your back files of the Moving Picture World you will find an article dealing with this very subject on page 1093 of the issue of February 23, 1918. Although this matter did not receive the fullest possible treatment it will serve your needs for the present, and we will be glad to deal more fully with the subject if you encounter serious obstacles.

Q. Please give me a few suggestions for playing "death bed scenes."

I have used "Asa's Tod" until it has become hackneyed, and I cannot seem to find anything else which will fit those sad scenes.

A. The number you mention is indeed very appropriate, and was written by Grieg for just such scenes. However, there is no need to search for a piece that specifically calls itself "death bed" music by title. Look for a slow adante pathetic and you will find many very adaptable selections. We suggest the following numbers as possible for deep grief.

"Adagio Cantabile".....Strauss
 "The Last Hope".....Gottschalk
 "A Keltic Lament".....Foulds
 "Nocturne".....Krzyszanski
 "La Melaeholle".....Prume
 "Consolation".....Liszt

There are many others, but these will give you an idea of what to look for.

Q. Do you believe in the use of French horns in a combination of eight instruments?

A. We do not. They have no place in such a small orchestra.

Q. Many musicians today are asked to double saxophone, cello-banjo, or banjo. Are these instruments used in theater work, or only in dance orchestras?

A. They are only used in dance orchestras in order to gain a jazz effect. Some theaters have experimented with them to obtain a variety of color, but have found that they are not effective in serious selections. If you have musicians who can double on these instruments an excellent effect is practical in the playing of the cabaret scenes and dance halls.

Q. What is the ideal eight-piece combination for picture work?

A. Piano, harmonium, 2 violins, cello, flute, clarinet, tympani. If the acoustics of your house will not allow for drums you have the option of substituting a cornet, which should be always played softly.

Q. Will you be good enough to tell me the names of several misterioso numbers? The "Lizze-on-the-Ice" stuff I've been using, is about played out. Also, please tell me a few good Jap numbers.

A. In the photoplay series of the following publishers will be found just what you are looking for in the way of Misteriosos: C. Fischer & Co., G. Schirmer, Inc., and Belwin, Inc., all of New York. The following list will suggest a variety of suitable Japanese selections:

"Vell Dance" (Ballet).....Friml
 "Jap Tattoo" (March).....Lawrenceau
 "Fuji Koe" (Intermezzo).....Shelley
 "The Bombardment" (March).....Heed
 "Japanese Reverie" (Andantino).....Bartlett
 "The Kingdom of Flowers" (Valse).....Ringlehan
 "Popples" (Romance).....Moret
 "A Night in Japan" (Suite).....Brahm
 "Japanese Sunset" (Meditation).....Zamanlek

Q. What is the correct name for the big bass horn used in bands, and does it require more wind to play this instrument than one of smaller type?

A. It is called the "Tuba," and, although the blowing of it requires no great effort, it is somewhat difficult to master owing to the fact that its notes are written almost entirely below the bass staff. It is also a very heavy instrument to carry.

Q. Are musicians now used in transatlantic passenger service? If so, what is the average pay?

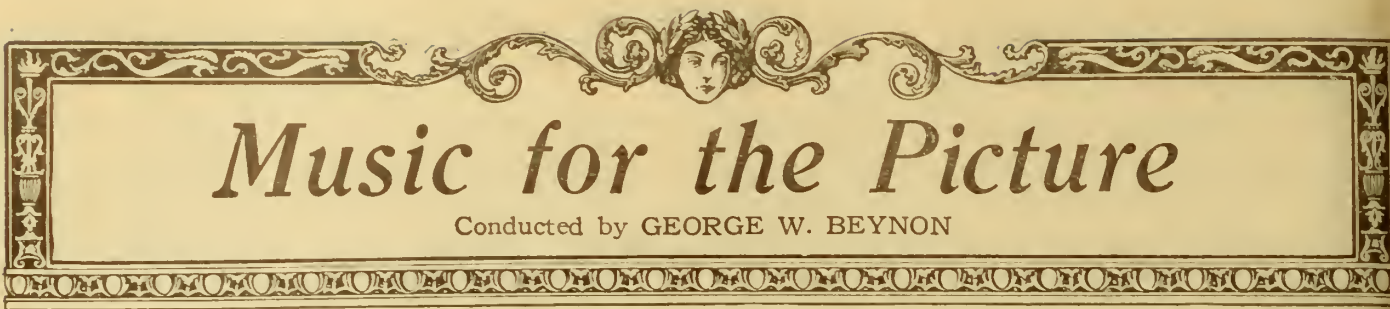

A. As there is little transatlantic service at present, and in view of the secrecy of departure few musicians are employed on the boats. In fact what music they have is obtained from a volunteer orchestra composed of ship-hands.

Q. With two violins in the orchestra which is composed of ten men, including piano, should both play in unison? What do you think of muted trumpets?

A. It largely depends upon what you are playing, as to whether it is best to have the two violins play in unison or not. A rousing march or fast number will be more effective with them in unison, while a slow and sweet selection can be better rendered if the violins be divided octavo. In pieces where the melody is marked sul G never divide them, as the added volume gives gratifying intensity. In such a small combination never use the "obligato violin" part. Sometimes the second violin can play cue notes of missing instruments with excellent results. Muted cornets are always effective in soft passages, and almost always can be counted upon to give variety. But don't overdo it. If cornets are muted continually the tone becomes monotonous and displeasing to the ears of your patrons.

Q. Can't you do something toward a better cue sheet than we have been getting from? There are so many "ad libs" in it that it is of little value as a musical suggestion.

A. Our aim in these columns of the Moving Picture World is to uplift the music in picture theaters, and we have devoted a great deal of mental and literary effort to articles pointing the way to film manufacturers. We cannot personally appeal to them to give better service lest we be accused of concealing an axe about our person which we wish to grind. You are in a position to write direct to the company, addressing your letter to the publicity department, and get quicker results than we can. The producer is trying to serve you, and if that service be inadequate he wants to know about it. Allow me to recommend that all leaders who have this difficulty confronting them make it their business to register their complaints with the proper authorities and not leave it for the "other fellow" to do. They seldom do it, and your problem remains unsolved.

The Proper Presentation of Pictures Musically.

SONGS AS THEMES.

THE demand for themes in picture settings becomes more urgent and also more exacting, the light intermezzo or serenade, the dreamy waltz or cavatina, is forced into the background and the song theme takes a more prominent place in extolling the virtues of the heroine. The essential attributes of a theme must be melody and rhythm. These are always found in songs because the lyrics compel rhythmic measure, and melody is what brings the song out of the rack and places it as a "hit."

There are many kinds of songs which should be classified under separate heads in the leader's library. Those used for themes are: classic, which includes works of the masters and near-masters found in concert and recital programs; light opera arias, and popular songs, sometimes called by the discourteous "Shoo-fly music." The classic might be divided into two sections, listed as concert songs and grand opera arias. The latter class is not used extensively, and with a corner of its own would not receive the rough handling incidental to a search for choice concert numbers.

Such themes as "Ashore"—Trotter, "Still as the Night," "For All Eternity"—Mascheroni, and the two famous numbers by Tosti, "Good-bye" and "Serenade," should be found in the concert song group. These are only a few examples, but indicative of the wide field from which one can choose. "Ashore" is a plaintive theme with a touch of sadness in it that makes it adaptable to the many situations that arise in the forlorn life of a troubled heroine. Of course it could not be used on all occasions for its melancholy trend would prohibit its fitting a pleasant plot. Its best results are to be gained by applying it as a theme to one who is absent and homesick.

"Still as the Night" carries the idea of steadfast and undying love and will fit many of the principal roles of the screen drama. "For All Eternity" holds a similar sentiment, while Tosti's "Good-bye" bids a hopeless farewell. The latter can frequently be used advantageously as an incidental number as well as a splendid theme. It is impossible to review the thousands of excellent songs which can be made to enrich the orchestral accompaniments to pictures, but there should be no difficulty in determining, in a general way, the proper interpretation of songs if the words be carefully read. Inasmuch as the words are not to be found in the orchestration, it may be necessary that the musical director buy the song itself. Let him do so. For the additional expense of thirty cents he will receive more than due compensation by an accurate rendition of a song that may be well known to the theater patrons. We can tolerate the poor playing of pieces adapted to the organ or orchestra, but the "killing" of a song stirs up murder in one's heart and the desecration is not soon forgiven. It is always the wisest course to refrain from playing any song with which you are not thoroughly conversant.

Of the better known grand opera arias the most familiar themes are "My Heart at Thy Sweet Voice" from Samson and Delilah, "The Toreador's Song," "Ilhanera," and the Don Jose aria from Carmen, "Valentine's Song" from Faust and the "Spring Song" from Manon. The use of these numbers should depend entirely upon the likeness between the screen actor and the opera principal, taking into consideration also the similarity of dominant emotions prevailing in the scenes. The task of fitting pictures with themes from the operas is a ticklish one. If properly chosen, it enhances the musical setting immeasurably, but if the leader is a poor guesser that number becomes a thorn in the musical flesh of the auditors, prickling them at every appearance.

Under the heading of grand opera arias should be filed all those popular duets, trios, quartettes and sextettes, which sometimes can be used to advantage. Those hackneyed "has-beens" like the "Trio from Faust"; Quartetto from Rigoletto and "Sextette" from Lucia should only find the light of day when that day is so wet and rainy that the patronage has completely crippled the cash box. Aside from the fact that these "hurdy-gurdy" favorites have traditional associations that forever bar them from depicting new ideas, no one wants to sit through a picture which they have paid to see and be regaled with music that they frequently pay to be rid of. Have some consideration for those who pay at the wicket. You may not have played the Faust Trio for some months, yet the organ grinder that very morning chose it as his piece-de-resistance for the neighborhood.

It has been shown how careful a musician must be in using operatic selections, and the same precautions must prevail in playing operatic songs. This axiom must be constantly before him: Never portray musically an emotion contrary to that represented by the screen action.

Light opera arias usually carry a title that is significant of the general feeling of the song. They are known by their titles as well as by their melodies, and the masses of musically unwashed can invariably call them by name. Therefore it becomes comparatively safe to select light opera numbers by their titles. The principal motif in Friml's "Auf Wiederseh'n" is a song by the same name which, freely translated, means "Until we meet again." The title holds in itself the suggestion of parting with the hope of a safe return and could be applied to a heroine who, in the early stages of the picture plot is torn from her lover and after many adventures returns to him, usually in the last reel. This number can be used as an incidental selection to fit any scene denoting the sad farewell.

Going back into one of the older operettas, we find a fine example of thematic material in that song from Dolly Varden, "As We Met in Lever's Lane." The melody is light, but reminiscent of a great love, and the fact that there appears the line, "a rose, a glove remind me," makes it most suitable for a scene showing the hero fondling a flower or glorifying a glove that once belonged to his saluted sweetheart.

For pictures which hold little dramatic intensity but lots of heart interest, light opera arias can be made to serve as effective themes.

Musical comedy numbers can be regarded in the same light as light opera, and owing to their popularity are always prime favorites as themes. Use them not too often and they become a verdant oasis in the desert of heavy music. They may be catalogued with light opera selections or placed under a separate listing, according to the ideas of the musical director.

Popular music depends upon the sentiment expressed in the lyrics of the song for its adaptability as a theme. The ballad style is used for features, while the lighter numbers can be fitted to comedies and pictorial reviews.

There is a strong tendency prevalent in the average audience to hush or slag with the orchestra when they are playing something very familiar. Herein lies a danger in using popular songs for themes. The orchestra leader cannot afford to embarrass some patronage by providing a vehicle of annoyance in the shape of a catchy song which is sure to be whistled.

The type of song to be found listed under popular songs should conform to such numbers as "Wait 'Till the Cows Come Home" (from Jack O'Lantern, but not light opera), "A Long, Long Trail," "Wait 'Till the Clouds Roll By," "Blue Bird," "Fancy Me Fancying You," and the perennial crop of song "hits." These can be made to serve a purpose as incidental music to the feature as well as being splendid material for light comedy dramas.

There is also a group of sacred songs that can be requisitioned frequently to good purpose. Of late, the religious aspect of pictures has been strongly developed and subtitles inserted which suggest certain hymns or sacred numbers. Besides the usual hymns, "Rock of Ages," "Nearer My God to Thee," "Lead Kindly Light," etc., there are splendid orchestral arrangements of "The Lost Chord," "The Palms," "The Holy City," "Onward Christian Soldiers" should be classed under marches as it has officially become the marching song of the Red Cross Society.

Let us not forget folk songs and patriotic numbers. They are closely related and yet must be listed separately for reasons of practicability. In the former group we find "In the Gloaming," "Seeing Nellie Home," "Suwanee River," "Old Kentucky Home," "Just a Song at Twilight," and many others of fond memory.

Nothing is more effective than these touching old ballads. They become the spice with which to flavor the musical interpretation of the picture, reaching the hearts of the listeners and bringing the tears to their eyes.

There is a strange peculiarity about the acceptance of these folk songs by the average audience. They are better known than any other form of music, yet they are listened to with bated breath. No whistling nor humming desecrates their sublimity. On the other hand, as a class, it stands alone as an exception to our general rule regarding the choosing of material for picture settings. We have found that no number should be used that will, by its influence, detract from the picture. Every folk song has to everybody a significance gained through hearing it during a crisis of their career. It is forever closely associated with that epoch in their life and its repeated bearing brings back the sadness of bygone days. Yet, in spite of the contradiction of dominant emotions, and because the song has become part of themselves, the folk song can be used with telling effect as a theme. Its possibilities are more numerous as incidental music, but if treated sparingly as a thematic motif, it will touch the hearts of the auditors and impress the picture strongly in their minds.

Patriotic songs should be subdivided into three classes, viz.: Amercan (T), American (N), and Foreign. The bracketed T and N represent Traditional and New. In the former division we have such songs as the "Star Spangled Banner," "Columbia, the Gem of the Ocean," "America," "Dixie," "Marching Through Georgia," "The Battle Hymn of the Republic," and many others of a similar nature. Under the second heading we note "Over There," "Whero Do We Go from Here," "Keep the Home Fires Burning" and "Pack Up Your Troubles in Your Old Kit Bag." This field of song is at present well cultivated and the crop seems constantly increasing. Keep right up to the minute with patriotism, shown by your careful selection of appropriate pieces. In the third division you will have "The Marseillaise" and other National hymns, as well as a few that are semi-patriotic and characteristic of the country.

Patriotic selections are always required in the animated magazine portion of the exhibitors' program, and at the present time find a place in the feature quite frequently. There are a few rules relating to the playing of national airs which should be closely adhered to.

1. Never change the tempo to try to fit the screen action. Play the number according to its traditional time.

2. If your scene be long never repeat the number, but select something else into which you may segue.

3. Never play parts or phrases of "The Star Spangled Banner." It is disrespectful.

4. Do not "over-do" the playing of this class of music.

The subject of song themes has been merely touched upon, for its magnitude carries many tentacles, the following of which would lead us far afield. We have tried to suggest a few of the possibilities in the thematic treatment of songs that may start a line of thought in the leader's mind, bringing greater results than we could possibly anticipate.

Music At the Rivoli.

During the week of July 14 the Rivoli offered its usual excellent program. Hot weather does not effect the bill at this theater, for Mr. Rothapfel always believes in giving value for value received, and is not prone to make the elements bear him out in an alibi.

The overture—La Forza Del Destino, by Verdi—was rendered in a masterly fashion by the Rivoli orchestra under the guiding hand of Erno Rapee. Mr. Rapee seems to have the orchestra under complete control, and they respond quickly to his rather choppy shoulder and arm beat. The finale was exceptionally fine in its dramatic abruptness.

The opera, "The Force of Destiny," was based on "Don Alvar," a Spanish drama by the Duke of Rivas. It was first performed at Petrograd in 1862. The opera as a whole does not rank among Verdi's greatest successes, but several numbers from it, notably the overture, have been favorites in the concert room. A revised version of the opera was brought out in 1869.

Martha Atwood sang "In an Old Fashioned Town" accompanying herself on the piano. We know that she sang, for we saw her in a beautiful setting, and heard the tinkling of the piano sometimes accentuated by an explosive tone, but this is not sufficient evidence that she was singing. We sat three rows from the front, and could not hear a word, so the best that we can do is to blame the acoustic properties of the house and let it go at that.

The animated pictorial personally edited by Mr. Rothapfel showed the fine touch of the artist in its musical interpretation. During the funeral of our late ex-Mayor Mitchel the sounding of "taps" was most effective and correctly timed.

The singing of "The Marseillaise" by Desere La Salle was wonderful. Coming before the audience dressed as a French peasant of the days of the Bastille's fall with a scythe in his hand he literally tore into that inspiring song and brought the audience to their feet with his fervor. His voice is by no means mediocre. He has a well placed tonality, and his enunciation is both clear and resonant. A pretty feature added to the song was a historical synopsis of the taking of the Bastille thrown upon a small screen behind the singer, but not obscured by him. When the refrain was repeated the audience joined in lustily and made it a regular family affair. Another evidence of the desire for community singing.

The feature was well fitted, and the piano playing effects were carried out with a degree of art that raised them from the commonplace. Our old friend Joe Littau was responsible for the dainty touch. All the way through the music was most appropriate and the synchrony splendid.

The playing of selections from "The Fortune Teller," by Heribert, was well done, and carried with it a fine spirit. The Happy Hooligan comedy and the usual organ solo completed a fine show.

Musical Suggestion Synopsis.

DECIDING KISS, THE (Bluebird—Five Reels)—Theme—Moderato Expressivo. Suggest "Legend"—Frml, "Berceuse"—Schytte, or "Tendre Aveu"—Schutt.

This is one of those sweet little stories of the country girl who conquers New York. The dramatic values are not very intense, and the music needed will not necessary be heavy. Long numbers will suit this picture better than short ones. You will need some waltzes and light intermezzos besides a quantity of melodious andantes. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Universal exchange.

GLORIOUS ADVENTURE, THE (Goldwyn—Five Reels)—Theme—Andante. Suggest "Twilight"—Ceseck, "Clair de Lune"—Thome, or "Extase"—Gannes.

Here you will find a dramatic picture with all the elements of excitement which means fast screen action. You will need big stuff of a dramatic nature, you will need a big burry and furioso, you will need some agitato, and a few deep pathetics. Note the big strike scene and the quarrel. The atmosphere is entirely American, so that you will not be restricted in your musical selection. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Goldwyn exchange.

HELL'S END (Triangle—Five Reels)—Theme for Mary—Andante. Suggest "Kathleen Mavourneen."

The atmosphere of the picture is that of the lower east side blended with a bit of Irish-American. The feature is very dramatic, and you will need the usual number of agitato, hurrys, and dramatic tensions. There are two fist fights to fit musically, and many scenes of squalidity. On the other hand society scenes are encountered, and the contrast should be well marked in your setting. A splendid number that can be effectively used in this picture is "Old Timers," published by C. Fischer. It is a compilation of old popular songs hits such as "Sweet Rosie O'Grady," "Sidewalks of New York," "Maggie Murphy's Home" and such songs of our childhood. Try to get a previewing of the picture, because the Triangle does not include cue sheets in their service to exhibitors.

HER MOMENT (General Film—Six Reels)—Theme—Moderato. Suggest "Katinka"—Frml.

This picture has three distinct atmospheres which must be well marked in the music. First we find the plot developing in the Balkans. This should be represented by music of a Hungarian character. Then we have the story transferred to Arizona and the "wild and wooly." Western music will fit nicely. Last we have New York City, which means neutral music of American type. The story is dramatic, and you will need some misteriosos and agitato. The selections from Katinka show will be found very adaptable to certain scenes in the early portion of the picture, and if rightly timed should bring in her theme at her introduction. Information regarding cue sheets is not available.

MARKED CARDS (Triangle—Five Reels)—Theme for the heroine—Andante. Suggest "Serenade"—Moskowski, "Twilight"—Ayer, or "Souvenir"—German.

The character of this picture is society drama wound around the devotees of the card game and gambling den. You will need some great stuff in certain portions of the picture, while in other parts the action calls for but light music. You will need an agitato for the quarrel, followed by a hurry in which there should be a shot effect. For the big trial scene it would be well to use a long pathetic andante selection. No cue sheets are available.

ONE DOLLAR BID (Paralta—Five Reels)—Theme.

This is a picture in which we find the atmosphere of Kentucky and its horses, mint juleps, and fine women. It is a dramatic feature, and much can be made of it musically. The use of the theme should be handled judiciously, as the hero is continually in the foreground, and the musical setting cannot well be composed of theme alone. There is a fine opportunity for light children's music while Toby is telling the youngsters stories. There will be found room for some fine misteriosos, a big agitato, a hurry when the sheriff is shot, some pathetic music, and a waltz intermezzo for the garden party. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paralta exchange.

UNCLE TOM'S CABIN (Paramount—Five Reels).

Everybody knows the play called "Uncle Tom's Cabin." We have all seen it many times, and if we do not know it by heart we should. Knowing the plot and being assured that the screen production follows the play very closely or the book more closely you will have no difficulty in fitting this picture. Be careful of the theme treatment, and make it marked as to which character you are trying to portray by it. Miss Clark plays two roles, and they must not be confused in the minds of the people. If your orchestra can handle a double theme it would be advisable. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paramount exchange.

WINNER TAKES ALL (Bluebird—Five Reels)—Theme.

The character of this picture is one of fighting love, if one could so call it. Two phases are continually in the foreground, either love or a fight. Therefore gather together your "mushy" stuff and alternate with hurrys and agitato. You will need also a couple of misteriosos and one or two pathetic numbers. The scenes are quickly changed, and you will require short selections to meet this need. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Universal Film exchange.

Questions Answered—Suggestions Offered.

Q. What division of instruments and what number of each would you consider best for a seventy-five piece symphony orchestra?

A. Seventy-five instruments is symphony proportion, and should hold all the families of strings, wood-wind, brass, and percussion. We would suggest the following ratio: Strings, 18 1st violins, 12 2d violins, 10 viola, 6 cello, 4 bass. Wood-wind, 2 flutes, 2 clarinets, 2 oboes, 2 bassoons, 1 contra bassoon, 1 cor anglais. Percussion, 1 tympani, 1 trap drum, 1 big drum. Brass, 3 cornets, 3 trombones, 4 horns, 1 baritone horn, 1 tuba. Owing to the fact that few of the concert numbers are arranged with cor anglais, contra bassoon, and baritone horn it would be wise to leave them out and add to your first violins.

Q. What is your opinion regarding the playing of music from the German composers?

A. We cannot tell from the form of your question whether you desire advice or simply wish to know our position in the matter. Personally, we would use nothing that emanates from Hunnish origin. Your library may be in such a shape that it would curtail your usefulness if you discarded all German music. In this case we would suggest that the very old composers such as Johann Sebastian Bach and his contemporaries might be permissible, but Strauss, Wagner, et al., will not raise you in the esteem of your patrons.

China Fits Pictures.

The J. P. Seeburg Piano Co. is in receipt of a very interesting paper from China. It is called The Review, and is published by the Empire Theater of Tientsin, China.

There is a special article concerning the installation in the Empire Theater of Tientsin, of one of the Style "V" Seeburg Organ Orchestras. The first automatic organ, we believe, used in the Orient motion picture houses.

Among other things, the article says:

Special attention is also being paid to our musical programmes and in line with all the largest picture houses in America and elsewhere, we have made arrangements to install one of the famous Seeburg Organ Orchestras.

Who can over estimate the value of a perfect musical accompaniment to a moving picture? The Seeburg instrument not only gives us a piano, but an organ, together with the resources and traps of an orchestra. There is nothing that suggests the mechanical. It is an instrument that has the human touch and the human soul, found, we believe, in no other instrument—possessing the quality of tone shading and personal expression which have made this instrument the choice of the proprietors of America's best motion picture theaters.

America is naturally the leader in all that pertains to pictures, and their musical accompaniments, but it is intensely gratifying to note that the right idea is spreading to such far-away lands as China. Inasmuch as music is a universal language, the time has come when all producers should insist upon a proper musical presentation of their pictures in other countries. Manufacturers of musical instruments should enter these distant and fertile fields with a view to good business and a spreading of musical art. Publishers of music have an opportunity of enlarging their scope of selling operations and even leaders in America should not overlook the opportunities presented in the Orient.

Orchestra of Allen Theater, Toronto, Canada.

Our Toronto correspondent informs us that the Allen Theater has perfected a splendid musical organization under the leadership of Luigi Romanelli, and is leading the way in picture settings throughout the Dominion. The members of this orchestra consist of English, Belgian and Italian artists and is a unique combination of wood and brass, including 3 violins, 1 flute, 1 clarinet, 1 bass, 2 French horns and organ, piano and drummer.

The absence of trumpet and trombone is extremely pleasing, for we have continually maintained in our columns that the brassy effect emanating from these instruments serves to detract from the picture. Mr. Romanelli, who was for many years director of the Strand Theater orchestra of Toronto, possibly the first musical director in Canada, has remarkable initiative ability and his choice of his orchestral instrumentations shows his keen insight into the picture game. He is an accomplished violinist himself, and frequently gives violin solos that are appreciated.

His practice is to play with his orchestra rather than merely lead it. Upon this point we must take issue with Director Romanelli. It requires all the brains and the talent of the best musicians coupled with a thorough knowledge of picture fitting to obtain the best results in directing. When he is forced to play also, he cannot give his whole attention to his orchestra and his picture, and thus the general result suffers.

Our best wishes go out to Brother Romanelli and his orchestra.

Musical Suggestion Synopsis.

GIRL PHILIPPA, THE (Vitagraph—Eight Reels)—Theme—Moderato. Suggest "May Dreams"—Borch, "Sunbeams"—Heliar, "Tendre A'Mour"—Clements.

The character of this picture is intensely dramatic and deals with the present war situation in Europe. Open with a misterioso and agitato followed by the theme. You will then need some dramatic music, followed by lighter stuff. You will require hurrys, agitados, and furiosos. Particularly note the battle effects, such as shots and explosions, motorcycle, automobile and train. A few light numbers can be used to advantage as contrast to the big stuff. Do not use more than one theme if you have a small combination. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Vitagraph Exchange.

GOLDEN WALL, THE (World—Five Reels)—Theme—Valse Lento. Suggest "Sleeping Rose"—Borch, "At Last"—Constance, "Golden Hearted Daisies"—Williams.

This is a society drama taking place upon an American estate. The music mainly will consist of light stuff, especially for the first three reels. Afterwards dramatic music will fit the climax of the feature. There is nothing particularly difficult about setting the music for this picture and long numbers will be found most adaptable. Cue sheets can be obtained from the World Exchange.

HER BODY IN BOND (Universal—Five Reels)—Theme—Moderato. Suggest "If It Should Be You"—Schroeder, "Elysian Dreams"—Deppen, or "Eleanor"—Deppen.

The first reel of this feature can be lightly set with long numbers. Commencing the second there is room for some pathetic music needed. It should be short and the light stuff continued until the third reel. Dramatic tension and pathetics are needed for this reel and three numbers should finish the reel. You will need a fox trot to open the fourth reel and continue with light stuff until the fifth, which will require heavy dramatic music. An agitato will also be of service in the last reel and close with the theme. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Universal Exchange.

HIGHEST BIDDER, THE (Vitagraph—Five Reels)—Theme—Moderato. Suggest "Roses and Memories"—Spector, "Told at Twilight"—Heurter, or "Land of Dreams"—Driffl.

The character of this picture is an emotional drama with the scene of action laid in a little village. There will be room for much pastorale stuff and little place for Photo-Play Series. The music will be light and vivacious, in the main opening with a touch of sadness. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Vitagraph Exchange.

JOAN OF THE WOODS (World—Five Reels)—Theme—Andante. Suggest "Silent Sorrows"—Borch, "Visions"—Tschaikowski, "Pleading"—Woods.

The character of this picture is an emotional drama with scenes laid in the North woods and later in a large city. Open with the Theme and follow with heavy dramatic music leading into an agitato. Light stuff follows for a reel, when the action develops dramatic values. The only effects are telephone bell, door bell and water, and under ordinary conditions it would be better to disregard them. Close with the Theme. Cue sheets can be obtained from the World Film Exchange.

LOVE WATCHES (Vitagraph—Five Reels)—Theme—Allegretto. Suggest "Garden of Love"—Ascher, "Idilio"—Lack, or "Love in Arcady"—Wood.

This is a comedy-drama with an atmosphere which is distinctly French. You will need some pastorales, serenades, a minuet and some light classical dance music. Light operatic selections could be used with excellent results. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Vitagraph Exchange.

MIDNIGHT MADNESS (Bluebird—Five Reels)—Theme—Moderato. Suggest "My Castle in the Air"—Kern, "In Poppyland"—Albers, "Starlight"—Culueta.

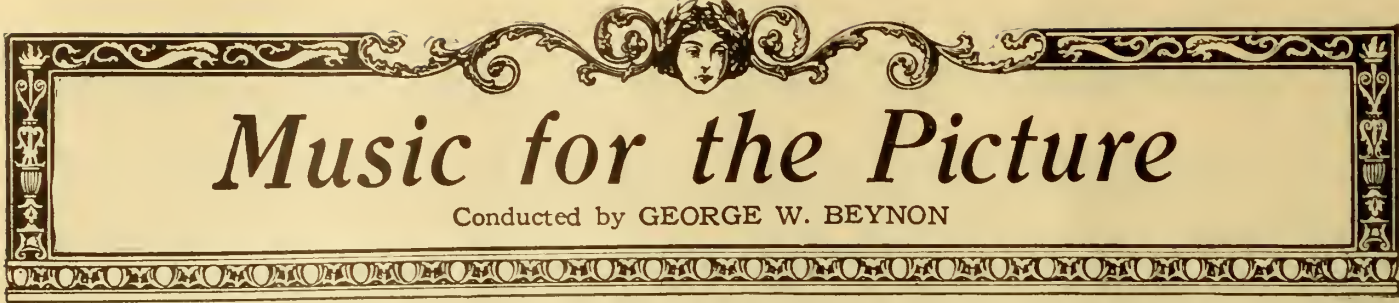

Open with a rather heavy misterioso followed by a dramatic tension leading into the Theme. You will then require a hurry, followed by a bright intermezzo and a couple of dramatics. You will need a fox trot, a waltz, and two marches besides some dramatic tensions. This will play the picture, closing with the Theme. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Universal Exchange.

SAFETY CURTAIN, THE (Select—Six Reels)—Theme—Andante Appassionato. Suggest Andante Appassionato—Castillo, "Awakening of Spring"—Bach, "A Little Song"—Erdody.

Here you will need music contrasting in atmosphere, England and India. The story is intensely dramatic and requires heavy music throughout. You will need some pathetics, dramatics and oriental selections. Note explosions in the second reel, storm scenes towards the end. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Select Exchange.

YELLOW TICKET, THE (Pathe—Five Reels)—Theme—Andante and Russian. Suggest "Russian Romance"—Friml, Serenade—Tschaikowski, or "Moments Musical"—Moskowski.

This is a dramatic story wholly in the atmosphere of Russia, dealing with the intrigues of the secret service and the police. It is intensely pathetic in some parts and requires some considerable music. Open with the Theme, followed by a plaintiff Russian folk song. You will then need a slow dramatic working up into an agitato and returning again to the dramatic. Following this there should be a slow pathetic, a light intermezzo, heavy dramatic and an agitato, followed by a pathetic after Anna stabs the Baron. Close with the Theme. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Pathe Exchange.

Picture Playing a Dignified Profession.

TIME was, when anyone who could pound out "Turkey In the Straw" on a time-worn piano would pass as a good picture player. That time is no more, however, and it is doubtful if such a player would be tolerated anywhere in these United States, no matter how backward the community, or primitive the theatre.

Similarly, there has been a corresponding improvement; more so, perhaps, than in the class of the music, great as that transformation has been.

Today the organist, pianist, or leader of the best photoplay theatre is a recognized artist, and the profession itself has become one to be proud of; so much so, indeed, that the very best musicians of the country are entering it.

And there are many reasons for this, for there are few professions which make a greater demand financially and physically on the student than does that of music. The cost of instruction exceeds that of almost any other calling, and the years spent in attaining proficiency comprise a greater proportion of the average working life than is the case with any other profession, while the returns are, in but few instances, commensurate with the investment. A music teacher's time is ordinarily worth so much per hour, and the hours of a day are limited; hence there is a limit to the financial possibilities of teaching, and few church organists there are, whose salary as such is enough to meet living expenses. The profession of picture playing, therefore, offers the highest possible returns, financially and artistically, to the qualified musician.

When the moving picture theatre was born no one imagined, unless here and there a stray prophet, that it would become one of the greatest factors in the economic and social life of the country, but such has been the case, and although it is only within the last two or three years that music has been given its proper value in relation to the picture, it is now universally accepted as a vital necessity. From one end of the country to the other the cry is going out for the proper sort of musician; but, alas, the supply is exceedingly limited.

It must be remembered that one may be a very good musician and yet be useless for the purposes of the theatre. The organist to whom a Bach fugue or a Mendelssohn concerto is a familiar joy, might prove an unqualified failure as an accompanist to a feature play. The pianist who finds no insuperable difficulties in Chopin, McDowell or Tschai-kowsky, might "fall down" with the simple score of an ordinary picture. And so with the orchestra leader. He might be capable of conducting a symphony orchestra through all the intricacies of a Strauss overture, and yet give no satisfaction to the audience of a "movie" show.

There is something over and above a technical and esthetic knowledge of music demanded in the theatre; in fact, this something can be best described under three heads: First and foremost, a strong sense of dramatic values; second, versatility, and, thirdly, repertoire. In brief, it is thorough musicianship plus these three qualifications.

There is an art in playing to the pictures which can only be acquired by thorough instruction and practical experience. The technique of the theatre is the very opposite of that of the concert platform or the Church; yet, other things being equal, the one is complementary to the other.

First-class theatres do not want fakirs. The day of the picture fakir is past. What is wanted is a musician in every sense of the word. One who has a cultivated sense of dramatic values in the picture, and the ability to translate and reinforce those values with the music. A player who can transpose a song, or orchestrate it for his orchestra, if need be. One who can improvise either original or given themes correctly and interestingly. A man or woman with a big repertoire of classical and popular music at his or her finger's ends, and the artistic skill to employ it suitably. Above all else, the ability to cue a picture understandingly, arranging a score which shall give the picture life and point, reinforcement and support, but which shall at no time obtrude itself to the detriment of the picture, or the story it is telling. Players of this calibre are what theatre men are calling for, and to whom they are willing to pay big salaries.

In fact, the recognition of picture playing as a dignified profession is becoming very prevalent, not only among workers in the film industry and musical fields, but in the lay mind of the picture fan. If a picture setting is haphazardly thrown together the patrons are instantly aware of it, and complaints stream into the office of the house manager.

This is not conducive toward the welfare of the negligent or ignorant orchestra leader.

In order to prepare piano players, organists and orchestra leaders for the proper presentation of pictures there has been formed in Los Angeles, California, The Professional School of Picture Playing, having as its principal Brother R. V. Johnson. Mr. Johnson has, for a number of years, been actively engaged in picture playing throughout the country. He has served as organist, pianist and orchestra leader in the most modern of American theatres, and for several years was conductor of the Butte Symphony Orchestra and the Rialto Theatre Orchestra, at the same time being organist and conductor of the American Symphony Orchestra and the Rialto Theatre Orchestra in Butte, Montana. His individual qualifications are of the highest, while his associates on the faculty are artists of wide experience in picture playing.

So far as we can learn, the Professional School of Picture Playing is not for the hidden purpose of "plugging" any particular brand of organ or piano. Its aim is purely educational for the purpose of helping to raise the standard of picture music. Nothing could be more worthy of the undivided support of musicians everywhere. We bespeak for it a brilliant future and extend the glad band of welcome with the assurance of our hearty co-operation and endorsement.

Union Musicians Back Up Their Uncle Sam.

Union musicians of the United States are playing in their highest key for the war aims of the country.

According to Owen Miller, National Secretary of the American Federation of Musicians, they are anxious to do still more, if they can, than they have done in the past.

In the recent Liberty Loan drive the musicians have subscribed to approximately $2,500,000 worth of the renowned bonds. In the second drive they loyally dug into their national and private money chests for nearly $2,000,000, and in the first loan campaign they bought an amount closely approaching the later two endeavors.

In the second loan drive the international organization subscribed for $55,000 worth of the bonds and would have taken $75,000 in subscriptions but $20,000 was tied up in a manner that made the proposition unmanageable.

Many of the affiliated musicians' unions, despite the fact that their treasuries were somewhat weakened for local reasons, nevertheless went the limit to stimulate success for Uncle Sam's war bond flotations.

And from one end of the nation to the other, wherever men have formed in the parade line to enthrone the citizens to the big issues before the nation, the union musicians have given of their best in music, service and in money.

The 88,000 members of the American Federation of Musicians can well be proud of the work, well done, they have accomplished for the United States of America in its hours of deepest stress. The nation, too, is proud of the noble band.

Musicians Must Work or Fight.

Considerable diversity has been expressed on proper interpretation as to just who shall be included in the order. The five district exemption boards of Missouri held an all-day meeting in Jefferson City, the capital of the State, June 20, 1918, for the purpose of agreeing on uniform action. This resulted in sending an official circular to all local exemption boards containing nine paragraphs instructing the local boards how the "Work or Fight" order, issued by Provost Marshal General Crowder, is to be applied. This circular was sent out by Lieutenant Colonel J. H. McCord, who has charge of the enforcing of the draft act, Paragraph 3 is appended and applies to musicians:

"3. Paragraph C of Section 121-K, includes, in addition to ushers and other attendants, all persons engaged and occupied in games, sports and amusements, except actual performers in legitimate concerts, operas or theatrical performances."

And this means that every professional musician who is not engaged in connection with legitimate concerts, operas or theatrical performances will be forced to enter other vocations or go to the front.

Take Care of Your Piano.

We are in receipt of a letter from a prominent singer who works for a song publishing house, confining his efforts to the city portion called Brooklyn. He complains bitterly about the condition of pianos in the picture theaters, which, he maintains, are not kept in tune nor receive any attention after they are once installed.

Exhibitors should take as great care of their piano as they do of their operating machine. A piano whose keys stick, the upper register is flat and the lower one sharp, while a few notes won't sound at all, is neither ornamental nor useful. It gives the place a black-eye with every music lover who enters the place. Pianists cannot be expected to provide good music unless they have a decent instrument upon which to perform. Singers cannot get results if they are forced to sing with a piano that varies in pitch with every octave (we mean, of course, out of tone balance).

The remedy is simple and comparatively inexpensive. An instrument that receives six and seven hours continuous playing should be tuned once every two months. If this be done regularly the tuner can easily adjust any loose connections or soften up the hammers. It simply resolves itself into the old adage, "A stitch in time saves nine," and, perhaps, a new piano.

Music At the Strand.

During the week of July 28, Harold Edell, of the Strand Theatre, offered his usual excellent program of music. Opening with the overture Masaniello, by Auber, and conducted by Carl Edouarde, it continued smoothly and artistically until the organ solo, March Triumphal, by Clark, which closed the show.

The overture was exceptionally well played, with pretty gradations of tone quality. The rhythm was well marked, and, although the inclination was to hasten the gladsome theme a trifle, the entire interpretation was splendid and in keeping with the traditional rendition. A pastoral setting, showing sheep grazing upon the hillside, assisted materially in conveying to the audience the dominate feeling of the overture. It is somewhat interesting to note the historical significance of this overture and the unique personality of its composer.

Daniel F. Auber, a prolific composer of French operas, was born at Caen in Normandy in 1782, died in Paris, 1871. His father, an art dealer and print seller in Paris, wished his son to devote himself to business, and sent him to London to acquire a knowledge of the trade. Auber's irresistible inclination for music, however, manifested itself and in 1804 he returned to Paris, following thenceforward his natural bent. His first opera, "Julie," was produced in 1812. He wrote several operas, among which "Masaniello ou la Muette de Portici," produced for the first time in 1828, was considered a masterpiece by Wagner. Its portrayal of popular fury is so graphic, that the Brussels riots followed its performance in that city in 1830. It seems to have been inspired by the revolutionary spirit prevalent at that time in Paris; it differs so wholly from Auber's other operas which are comic.

The pictorial had a choice selection of music. The early part showing the prisoners who had been captured by the French, was played by the organ, and Brother Brigham showed great ingenuity in the paraphrasing of the Marseillaise. During the air raids on the churches a slow pathetic was rendered by the orchestra and proved most effective in contrast. The Oriental music accompanying the scenes of Palestine carried the true eastern atmosphere and won appreciation from the audience.

Maleta Bonconi, a little lady violin virtuoso, showed a considerable dexterity in the playing of "Hejre Kati," by Hubay. Her bowing is good, although her interpretation could only be classed as fair, while her harmonics were exceptionally fine. In her second number "Souvenir," by Drdla, which was played con sordino, she showed a breadth of tone which was extremely pleasing and found popular favor.

The feature, "The Border Legion," was accompanied by orchestra without a fault. The choice of music was excellent and the fact that they always remained under the picture proved effective. During the scene between the hero and the heroine, in a lone hut on the plains, dramatic value was enhanced immeasurably by the excellent synchronization of the selection. The finale was magnificent.

Following the feature Herbert Waterous, basso, rendered "A Fighting Man," by Capel, in a manner that was truly artistic. We have always maintained that the experienced artist, and preferably those who have gained a wide reputation, through good work, is to be strongly desired in the picture field. Mr. Waterous has a voice far above the average, and is always sure of a welcome wherever he appears.

The comedy and organ solo close a splendid bill.

Wedding March—Sousa.

It is interesting to learn that Lieutenant John Philip Sousa is writing a "Wedding March." There will be no doubt, in quarters qualified for discriminating judgment, as to Mr. Sousa's capabilities. The trouble will come in finding a bride who will have the courage sufficient to spurn the galling jade of ancient precedent and make her way to the altar in the strains of a wedding march "made in America." May the Star of Inspiration shine bright upon Lieutenant Sousa's pathway as he assumes this commendable undertaking.

Musical Suggestion Synopsis.

A GENTLEMAN'S AGREEMENT (Vitagraph—Five Reels)—Theme—Valse Lento. Suggest "Kathleen"—Berg, "Waters of Venice"—Von Tilzer, or "Adele"—Briquet.

The character of this picture is strongly dramatic and of modern times. The atmosphere is western and will require music of the western type. Note the wedding scene where organ can be effectively used, but do not play Wagner nor Beethoven unless you have nothing to substitute. You will need light music in large quantities for the first half of the picture and graduate it so that it works up into dramatic stuff. You will need three agitatos, a misterioso, a hurry and a furioso. Some dramatic tension music can be advantageously used also. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Vitagraph Exchange.

A NINE O'CLOCK TOWN (Paramount—Five Reels)—Theme—Moderato. Suggest "A Perfect Day"—Bond, "Serenade"—Liandon, "Legend"—Friml.

This is a comedy-drama calling for light music with moments of dramatic value. Here will be needed serenades, bright intermezzos, a few light waltzes. Some agitatos and fast allegros can also be used.

There are two opportunities for special effects. In the beginning of the picture when the clock strikes use an imitation of a cuckoo, and in the second and fourth reels produce a band effect, playing a march. If your orchestra be large, cut out all the strings and work a brass quartet with woodwind. This might be done by the organist also, and be productive of good results. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paramount Exchange.

DANGER MARK, THE (Arctcraft—Five Reels)—Theme—Andantino. Suggest "May Dreams"—Borch, "Extase D'Amour"—Roze, or "Melodie"—Lederer.

The story is one of retrospection within. It is psychological in its appeal and will need rather heavy music. It is a picture that will require some study to evolve the best musical accompaniment and a previewing should be obtained if possible. There are no startling situations and the plot moves along smoothly, so that long numbers will prove most effective. Do not use the theme too frequently, but let it act as a re-enforcement of the strong points in the picture. You must use a waltz to fit the dancing scene and some heavy dramatic music will come in handy as you approach the finish of the picture. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Arctcraft Exchanges.

DEMON, THE (Metro—Five Reels)—Theme—Allegretto. Suggest "Impish Elves"—Borch, "Dance of the Moths"—Weidt, or "Barhetta"—Nevin.

Here is a picture that will require great ingenuity to bring out the contrasts of many atmospheres. You will need, besides modern music, some Oriental stuff, a little distinctive Italian music and some varieties, emblematic of the British snob. The picture is serio-comic and the music should be exaggerated almost to burlesque proportions. We would suggest the opera "Perdita" as a most suitable source of search for needed material. In view of the fact that the heroine bears the same name, lovers of this opera would appreciate its significance while it has the necessary Italian flavor. You will need some agitatos and misteriosos, some dramatic tensions and hurries to make up the proper setting. No special effects are needed. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Metro Exchange.

FEDORA (Paramount—Five Reels)—Theme—Andante Dramatic and Russian. Suggest "Fedora"—Giordano (the Andante portion), "Visions"—Tschaikowski, or "Reve Angelique"—Rubinstein.

The character of this picture is intensely dramatic and follows closely the story by Sardou. The operatic version will be found invaluable and with close attention it can be made to play almost the entire picture. The music must be entirely in the Russian atmosphere and very heavy throughout. The usual number of hurries and agitatos will be needed. Pauline Fredericks plays the title role and you, who have played her earlier offerings will know exactly what to expect. Get a pre-viewing if you can, as the cue sheets available do not get under the surface of the drama. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paramount Exchange.

LESS THAN KIN (Paramount—Five Reels)—Theme—Andantino. Suggest "Esperanza"—Johnstone, or "Midsummer's Night Serenade"—Albeniz.

The music for this picture is light and of the Spanish type mainly. You will need a misterioso, a march and a waltz lento. In the first reel begin with "La Paloma" and continue with the Spanish atmosphere until the pathetic moment, when it is permissible to leave the atmosphere if necessary for proper portrayal of the situation. There is a direct cue calling for a "Perfect Day," by Bond. Don't miss it. Close with the theme. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Paramount Exchange.

LESSON, THE (Select—Five Reels)—Theme—Moderato. Suggest "My Castle in the Air"—Kern, "Wait Till the Clouds Roll By," or "Melodie"—Kargonoff.

Open with light music of the serenade and intermezzo variety which will take you up to the third reel. During the latter you will need to fit a wedding procession, its following marriage ceremony and the leaving from the church. If your patrons object to the usual "Bridal Chorus" from the "Wedding March" because of their German origin, play the "Bridal Chorus" from the "Rose Maidens," by Cowen, then "Traumerie"—Schumann, and "The Coronation March," by Svenden. This is the only spot that will give any difficulty. No Photoplay Series is necessary for this picture. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Select Exchange.

Soul OF BUDDHA (Fox—Five Reels)—Theme unnecessary.

This is a picture dealing in three atmospheres, Oriental, Scotch and French. You will require agitatos and dramatic tensions as well as a few pathetics. When the dancers appear it would be advisable to use Ballet Egyptian No. 1, by Luigini. See that the musical contrasts are well marked. Cue sheets can be obtained from the Fox Exchange.

Leaders' Service Bureau.

Questions Answered—Suggestions Offered.

Q. I use a fourteen piece orchestra, regular combination. In storm scenes how can I get the best effect, with "strings," "wood-wind," or "brass"?

A. The use of the strings and wood-wind is preferable, as the brass has a tendency to overbalance the orchestra if used. Examples of excellent writing for storm effects are to be found in "Scotch Poem," by MacDowell, and "Promethius," by Liszt. If your selection is heavily scored for brass muted effect secures an even balance.

Q. In writing a march is it better to keep the theme in the same key throughout or change it?

A. The usual form is to have the trio in a relative key going back into the first key in the coda. Sousa, however, usually holds the coda in the same key as the trio, which is usually a fifth higher than the opening one.

Music for the Picture

Conducted by GEORGE W. BEYNON

Unity of Musical Purpose Brings Better Service

WE live in the age of unions. The keen competition in industrial lines has forced upon men the significance of the axiom, "United we stand, Divided we fall." The playing of the pictures has become an industry because of its magnitude of operation, and the essentiality of the work.

At present, every leader is doing his own work in his own way, drudging out the hours of employment, which being long, preclude his learning of the advances made in his art. He has had no trade journal devoted to his interests, giving him up-to-date information. What they are doing in the big houses in the large cities, gets to his ears by inaccurate hearsay. This has a tendency to confuse him. In spite of these drawbacks, it is remarkable how much progress has been made in the musical interpretation of pictures. But we feel that the time has come when there should be a greater unity of purpose, feeling and brotherhood in the ranks of the picture playing musician.

The Moving Picture World realizes the importance of the problem of uniting the theatre musicians in such a way that will be advantageous to them and the picture industry in general. We have spent the last six months in searching out the detached and distant musician with the view to ascertaining his needs in his chosen profession. From the data we have received, we believe that this department, in its enlarged form, will give better service in the future than in the past.

"Music for the Pictures" will henceforth contain an interesting and leading article dealing with the varied phases of picture presentation musically. It will give you the reviews of music rendered at the big New York picture palaces and other notable performances throughout the country. An educational feature of the department will be a thumb-nail history of our patriotic songs, telling you about the composer, the reason for the song and interesting facts connected with its birth and growth. There will be a page devoted to the latest musical "hits" and a "Leader's Service Bureau" in which will be found answers to your many problems and a "Roll of Honor," calling attention to special musical numbers, well adapted to picture playing.

The cue sheet problem, which has become a bugbear to the leader, will be dealt with in a classified and larger form. Here you will find a cue sheet for every picture which has been released, alphabetically arranged and clearly comprehensible to every leader. It will not be necessary to use the entire book upon the rack. These sheets can be used separately and returned to the files for playing a "repeat date." The arrangement will be uniform and standardized, no matter what producer releases the picture. This new idea has been praised by all leaders who have seen it, and we anticipate every musician will welcome this progressive service.

There is no field in the musical profession where such great quantities of music are bought yearly and used so profusely. A pianist with a library of five hundred numbers, considers he is well equipped for his work, yet five hundred selections would not last a month even if it were possible to play them all in the picture theatre. Songs will bear almost a continuous repetition, but a leader dare not repeat his numbers too frequently.

One of the drawbacks with which every leader is familiar is the dearth of new music. His only way of securing such is by means of catalogues, which are not definite, or by personal search through publishing houses. Inasmuch as the large majority of the publishers are situated in New York City, the out-of-town director must rely on lists which may trickle through to him. We have been surprised and aghast at the musical antiques forced upon the people who visit the out-of-way theatres.

Our aim will be to bring to the attention of the picture playing musician all new numbers suitable for his use from the various publishing houses with a short review upon their picture possibilities. This should prove a wonderful boon to the leaders throughout the country.

Those things doled out to us by the hand of one in equal rank are regarded of greater worth than the advice emanating from the mealy mind of the efficient expert. Therefore, we shall be pleased to give space in our columns to interesting letters dealing with the solution of the leaders' problems. Give us the benefit of your experience that your brother may profit thereby. This will make for unity of brotherhood and create in this column a mutual confidence club, interesting and educational to all.

In this connection, it might not be premature to suggest the formation of a Picture Playing Club, the membership of which would consist of musicians who are earning a living playing for pictures. Let us hear an expression of opinion on this matter. We can assure you we are strongly for it. When we place our profession upon a more dignified basis in the picture industry, we reap for ourselves the rewards of better art.

The Moving Picture World in enlarging your department, officially recognizes the musician as a vital factor in the film industry. It extends the hand of welcome and friendship, offering itself as a medium for mutual mingling and friendly fraternizing. It joins the hand of the producer with that of the leader, delivering to him a service in cue sheets that heretofore has been anything but satisfactory. Its whole-hearted efforts, its unstinted expense, and its ever-prevailing progressiveness should receive the praise and popular support of all musicians in the country. Make the Moving Picture World your Bible and "Music for the Pictures" your best loved text.

Music At the Strand.

D. W. Griffith has rightly gained the name of "The Master of Filmcraft." His picture, "The Great Love," presented at the Strand during the week of August 11, shows his clever handiwork and artistic touches. Notwithstanding this fact the music poorly portrayed what Mr. Griffith tried to interpret in his wonderful picture.

Old and well-known songs were used as themes and suited the roles admirably. There was a lack of smoothness to the setting, which detracted from the picture considerably and we felt that the fault lay in poor modulation. At times there was no modulation whatsoever, while at other times only a drum-roll could be heard in joining two numbers of extraneous keys. It was evident that the music belonged to a score, the composers of which gained no credit for themselves for such slipshod methods. The Synchrony was good, but the use of Il Guarny in the bedchamber scene was anything but appropriate.

The overture selection from "I Pagliacci" by Leoncavallo was handled by Conductor Edouards. The rendition was traditional in every respect, and although the orchestra once in a while beat the conductor to the note, we are safe in saying that there could not be any exception taken to the interpretation.

The back-set showed a Venetian canal bordered with Italian foliage, half hiding the picturesque bungalows in the distance.

The Strand topical review followed and as usual was well fitted and played.

An innovation was used in the idea of community singing of "The Star Spangled Banner," led by Miss Cora Tracy, contralto.

In a recent issue of these columns we dwell extensively upon the educational value and propaganda purposes of Community singing in the picture theatres. Our suggestion was that a slide be used in order that, by having the house darkened, the singing would be louder and more spontaneous. However, Mr. Edel has evolved a new feature by having a patriotic address, showing the history of our flag. This was followed by singing "The Star Spangled Banner" by the audience from a booklet donated by Hinds, Hayden & Eldredge. The booklet is a pocket edition with words and music and is exceptionally legible in spite of the condensed space. The idea is splendid and should be followed up in some form by every exhibitor in the country.

The performance closed with the usual excellent organ solo.

Music at the Rialto.

We dropped into the Rialto sufficiently early to get the first show, and although we were one of only a handful, the entire performance was gone through as if the house was crowded. This speaks well for the discipline of the theatre and the conscientious endeavors of its employees.

The overture was the selection from Rigoletto, conducted by Hugo Riesenfeld. Mr. Riesenfeld is always at his best, and his rendition of Rigoletto was masterly and in good musical taste.

The scenic, showing scenes in Pachua, Mexico, was admirably fitted with excerpts from the Land of Joy. The Spanish flavor of this operetta was sufficiently light to hold the Mexican atmosphere without obstruction.

Emanuel List sang Pinski's Bedouin Song. Mr. List has distinctly a voice of the basso profundo type and, owing to the wide range of this song (usually sung by a baritone), he was not altogether at home in it. However, the audience, because of its beautiful setting, liked the song. The Rialto has virtually three stages. The centre showed an Oriental interior with great red lanterns hanging before a blue background. On the right was a full moon in a blue sky being filled with myriads of glittering stars. It was indeed effective.

The animated magazine, personally edited by Mr. Rothapfel, was not only well set, but enjoyed perfect synchrony. The use of Old Lang Syne in a wintry scene, showing the frozen Hudson cloaked in snow, held a pretty suggestion. The scene following, in which we were shown swimmers enjoying a vacation, was fitted with a sort of patriotic fantasy introducing "Tramp, Tramp, Tramp, the Boys Are Marching," and a paraphrasing of the "Star Spangled Banner." We could not understand the analogy. "Keep the Home Fires Burning," sung by the orchestra, was a delightful innovation, while "Throw Out the Life Line" had no place in the scene showing the baptismal exercises. Nothing is gained by burlesquing a religious ritual, and much harm may come from it.

Josephine Garavelli sang "Caro Nome," from Rigoletto, in a fashion academic. She really is a dramatic soprano essaying colorature roles.

The feature "Green Eyes" was well played, but the Southern atmosphere was not sufficiently distinctive to be noticeable. The musical synchrony was good and at no time did the orchestra predominate over the feature.

The bill closed with selections from "Nobody Home," played by the orchestra, and the usual comedy and an organ solo, "March Romaine," by Gounod. Arthur Dewey, the organist, played this number with fine feeling and true interpretation.

Washington Society Hears "Blue Bird."

Tom Moore, of Washington, D. C., believes firmly that music and its related art, dancing, are mighty factors in putting over pictures. His recent presentation of the Paramount feature, "Blue Bird," showed unmistakably his forcefulness of purpose.

The complete presentation prologue was as follows:

Overture by the augmented symphony orchestra, featuring Clare Kummer's song, "The Blue Bird," with slow curtain revealing stage dimly lighted with blue tone, fleecy clouds drifting slowly by; "The Blue Bird" second chorus sung off stage. Gradually expanding light until stage, banked in flowers, is discernible; to dance in spotlight; ensemble flower ballet, at conclusion of which the dancer again appeared, ending ballet with tableau picture. Foreword to the picture by Maurice Jarvis, as Father Time, at top of steps, back stage with Tyltyl and Mytyl in costume, with bird cage, etc. Scene then parted revealing barge under full sail, in which Father Time, Tyltyl and Mytyl started on the journey to Memoryland. Quick curtain and immediate projection of picture.

The picture was well fitted with excerpts from the "Blue Bird" music as used in the Shubert production of it, and the quaint but simple memory themes that were so appropriately chosen held the atmosphere. The people who came to see a picture heard a symphony of blended tones and lightings. They went away purified by the beauty of Art as exemplified in the combination of music and color.

Every picture is not so adaptable to such esthetic treatment, but every feature has its artistic possibilities.

"Home, Sweet Home."

Probably the sentiment most deeply implanted in the human heart is love of kindred and home. Someone has said that patriotism can and often does supplant it, particularly in time of war. But, in the last analysis, one's country is one's home in the larger sense.

When, in October, 1822, John Howard Payne sent to Sir Henry Bishop, composer of music for Covent Garden, a manuscript, he placed himself among the immortals. In the story the heroine elopes. Some time later she hears a band of strolling musicians singing one of her native airs. Its appeal sends her back to her parents. That song was "Home, Sweet Home." Rendered by Maria Tree's charming voice it was received with great enthusiasm. The singer ceased her work nearly a century ago, but the echo of the words still responds throughout the English speaking nations.

Payne wrote in Paris, and for a London audience, but the home for which his heart hungered had been lost to the wanderer since early childhood—a little cottage on Long Island. The song won a wealthy husband for the singer and a modest fortune for the theatre and publisher. But the inspired genius of it all did not materially profit by its sale. Fame eventually came to him through this medium, but at the time of publication his name was not permitted on the title page.

The music was not his. Sir Henry Bishop had written it several years previously, calling it a Sicilian Air. There has been not a little dispute over its origin. Some authorities claim that it was borrowed from a group of Sicilian songs. However, when Donizetti wanted a distinctively English tune he chose it. That should dispose of the Italian theory, as it seems incomprehensible that Donizetti should not know the folk-song of his native land.

We have all known and sympathized with John Howard Payne as a sufferer of many vicissitudes, lonely, poor and dying in a strange land. Few seem to have heard that he was a very prominent figure in his profession. As a matter of fact he wrote and adapted over fifty plays and was the first American to make a reputation as an actor and playwright abroad.

He came of excellent parentage. The family name appeared in Eastham, Mass., as early as 1622. His father settled in East Hampton, L. I., became principal of Clinton Academy, and married Sarah Isaacs, the daughter of a convert from the Jewish faith. Payne's early childhood was spent in this home, and the house which he immortalized still stands.

Manifesting a passion for the stage while very young, his parents frowned on his aspirations and sent him to a clerkship in New York. This course had no effect on his ardor. Indeed, he spent practically all his wages in theatre tickets and in launching a dramatic paper, "The Thespian Mirror." He was then only fourteen years of age. Yet the articles were so ably written that the Evening Post announced that it would publish some of them. Fearing exposure and parental displeasure, Payne called upon the editor to protest. That gentleman was astonished at the extreme youth of the boy. But the handsome lad, with his charming manners and truly remarkable talents, made a lasting impression. As a direct result of this interview a fund was raised and Payne was sent to college.

Before he had finished his college course family reverses made it imperative that Payne should become self-supporting. So, in his seventeenth year, he made his debut on the stage of the Park theatre, New York. Through his ability the drama was a great success.

Two months later he acted Hamlet to a sold-out house. Subsequently he appeared on the London stage with equally flattering results. Unfortunately in a moment of weakness he decided to launch forth as a manager. His artistic temperament left no place for business acumen and he soon landed in a debtor's prison.

Fiction says Payne was starving in a garret when he wrote "Home, Sweet Home." History tells us that at the time he was busy writing adaptations for the stage that he was well remunerated and had every comfort. Home-siek he doubtless was. His letters to his brother prove that. He says: "Though I am naturalized to vagabondism, still it is vagabondism. I long for a home about me."

Eventually he returned to the United States and was appointed Consul at Tunis. There he died in 1852. After a lapse of thirty years his remains were brought to Washington and reinterred. The Regimental Band softly played "Home, Sweet Home." The President of the United States and his Cabinet escorted the body to its last resting place. The "exile" had come "home."

"The Common Cause" Score by Klein.

The musical setting for Commodore J. Stuart Blackton's propaganda picture, "The Common Cause," now in production, is being composed and arranged by Manuel Klein.

Mr. Klein was for ten years composer and conductor at the Hippodrome and was associated with its first managers, Messrs. Thompson and Dundy. He was also with David Belasco for a period of four years and with Daniel Frohman several seasons.

With his brother he collaborated on "Mr. Pickwick," a light opera, and on "His Imperial Highness," another musical success. His musical compositions and arrangements for the special releases of the "All Star Feature Film Company" are noteworthy and contained many adaptations of his brother's plays.

Mr. Klein has completed the music for "The Common Cause," and is now engaged on the orchestration. While his themes have naturally been suggested by the script, yet he has been a frequent visitor to the French village exterior, where Commodore Blackton has been filming scenes for the past three weeks. He says he wishes to absorb the atmosphere of the setting and the spirit of the characters by meeting the people portraying them. He feels that he receives more inspiration from seeing a scene taken than from viewing it when projected on the screen.

Mr. Klein's brother, Charles Klein, was lost on the ill-fated Lusitania. Despite the sorrow and bitterness caused by his brother's death Mr. Klein is too broad-minded to taboo all German music. He says: "What had the old composers to do with the war which began in 1914? They lived years ago. They were not Hung, but merely German by birth, many of them having no pride of country. Wagner, who died in 1883, lived most of his life in Paris, confessing that he hated Germany. Mendelssohn spent his mature life in Paris and London. But we should everywhere, in the most insignificant film theatres, as well as in the greatest opera house, taboo entirely the works of modern German composers. They are Germans of the Germans, whose music breathes the very spirit of war."

The propaganda theme of "The Common Cause" naturally appeals to Mr. Klein, and his musical setting is a reflection of his enthusiasm for the cause of war as expressed in this super-feature. The film is being produced through the British-Canadian Recruiting Mission.

Belwin, Inc., and Motion Picture Music.

The old adage that a "workman cannot work without tools" is ably demonstrated by musicians engaged in film interpretation. Whatever their ability may be they cannot interpret the screen action without appropriate music.

As reported in these columns a few weeks ago, a unique combination has just been formed of the entire catalogue of the Cinema Music Company, S. M. Berg, whose service to the film industry is well known, and Sol. P. Levy, whose compositions and arrangements compare favorably with those of America's foremost musicians, have now entire charge of the business and theoretical end of Belwin, Inc.

Already published under Belwin's copyright are a new series entitled "Berg's Descriptive Series," bearing such titles as "Silent Sorrows," "Peacefulness," "The Crafty Spy," "Battle of Ypres," "Turbulence," "Perpetual Motion," "Slimy Viper," all composed by that renowned musician, Gaston Borch. A charming and melodious composition by Gaston Borch entitled "May Dreams" has already created a furore where music is considered of importance.

Among the many other compositions already placed on the market by Belwin, Inc., may be mentioned "Impish Elves," "Over the Top, Boys," "Blue Devils," "Fighting Tommies," "Hunkatin," "Aces High," "Sinister Theme," "Two Characteristic Themes," "Indian Mysterioso," "Weird Oriental Theme," "Military Hurry," "Furioso" and "Hurry."

Belwin's compositions, which are now in the course of preparation, are interesting reading, because they comprise a variety of publications unique in the annals of musical literature. Particularly worthy of mention are "Poem Symphonic," "Serenade Romantic," "Flirty Flirts," "Birds and Butterflies," "Bleeding Heart," "Comedy Allegro," "Dramatic Suspense" and "Yankee Tars."

This progressive house has inaugurated a policy in which every musician engaged in the film industry should be interested. We refer to B. S. A., which signifies Belwin Service Account. This means that any musician or theatre manager who will extend the courtesy of the usual trade references will receive a credit account which guarantees that all their musical requirements, irrespective of whom the publisher may be, will be promptly supplied by Belwin at the lowest possible professional prices. Furthermore, all orders will be shipped the same day received. This assures to musicians such service as has never before been at their disposal.

To peruse the account ledger of Belwin, Inc., is figuratively surveying a list of the "400 of the motion picture industry." The service which Belwin, Inc., is able to give to its patrons is due to the fact that it is now carrying an international and representative stock of every other publisher's music which is adaptable and desirable for musical interpretation of the film.

"Mickey" Inaugurates Novel Campaign.

About a year ago "Mickey" was first introduced to the exhibitors and public through the trade papers.

Daniels & Wilson, music publishers, are putting out the composition "Mickey," adapted for the picture. The advertising campaign is allied with the national campaign on the photoplay, and the song is being widely exploited throughout the country. A million copies have already been disposed of and the publishers claim that at the rate they are now going five hundred thousand copies per month will be added to this amount.

Many prominent vaudevillians are singing "Mickey" with marked success. The Tivoli theatre in San Francisco featured this song and a famous vaudevillian sang it with a chorus slide. It was subsequently repeated at a number of other T. & D. houses, where it was equally well received. In fact Mr. Daniels advises us that the theatres are clamoring for the song—its popularity is so great wherever it is featured.

Because of this enormous popularity Mr. Daniels is arranging to send a full orchestration of "Mickey," with a set of slides, to all the largest theatres in the country. This is done that when the feature is released the public everywhere will be familiar with the name of "Mickey." They have also arranged to have 15,000 retail music dealers and all the Five and Ten-Cent Store Syndicates in the country devote a full window display to the song, together with some lobby display photos from the production. This plan will be carried out in each locality as the photoplay "Mickey" is released there.

The Columbia Graphophone Company is making a dance record of "Mickey" played by one of the best known Jazz Bands in the city. They will also exploit this record throughout the country in connection with the national campaign on the photoplay.

A song record is being made by the Victor Phonograph Company and a piano roll by the Aeolian Company.

Simultaneously with the first release of the picture on Broadway, New York, these four music concerns will launch a campaign to link up with the photoplay.

Presentation of "The Americans Come."

All songs do not lend themselves readily to a forceful presentation in picture theatres, but "The Americans Come," by Fay Foster, published by J. Fischer & Co., of New York, holds wonderful possibilities in this line.

A suggestion offered recently by a well known musician is certainly worthy of repetition. Enthusiastically he outlined his idea as follows:

"Get a first-class baritone. Dress him as an old man, blind and upon crutches. Have him placed left-front with a good looking soprano by his side. The set should show the interior of European living room, having a large French window at the back a little to the right.

"Usual bits of furniture can be found about. Open with dark stage until the singer begins. Then gradually dim up in red, increasing with a white, until dusk effect is produced, and then by the use of side projection throw a strong light from the back through the window, indicating sunshine. If the theatre has side panels have a moving picture of marching soldiers thrown on them from the projection box during the refrain. See that your sunlight effect does not conflict with your projection of this.

"As the song draws to a close dim down on your sunlight, then dim your foots, closing in semi-darkness, but at the last note flood the house for applause effect. It will make the song and give the audience a real thrill."

There is no question about the wonderful power of patriotic propaganda inherent in this song, and if you present it properly it will prove a drawing attraction.

John McCormack Sings Great Ballad.

It has been said that the war has brought no great musical epic. The one who perpetrated such a pessimistic thought dwelt in the broad halls of Ignorance.

"God Be With Our Boys To-Night" will live in the future with all the great songs of the masters. There is a depth of feeling in the lyrics that appeals to the heart of every true American. The music is particularly melodious and catchy. This is made evident by the whistling of it upon the streets by precocious urchins. Its patriotic fervor is blended with a gentleness of spirit that permeates our being.

One would naturally suppose from these qualifications that it could not be anything but a popular "shoo-fly" number. It is nothing of the kind. It can be safely catalogued under the heading of classic, and the fact that it is printed by Boosey & Co. is sufficient evidence that there is nothing trashy in the music. Besides our famous and dearly loved John McCormack is singing it with immense success. This surely bespeaks merit.

"God Be With Our Boys To-Night" has been beautifully arranged for orchestra and should find a place in every leader's library. Typically a theme, it can be used for many other purposes effectively. The plaintive movement of the refrain will suit pathetic situations, while the verse part has a hopeful rhythm most adaptable to 'cello solos.

As a song it has been sung at all the big theatres with great success and the exhibitor who wants new material for effective propaganda purposes will do well to get this season's success.

Picture Playing Creates a New Industry.

Throughout the ages no occupation has been able to stand alone, and the profession of picture playing is no exception to the rule. It, in itself, was called into being through the requisition of the film and work allied to and contingent upon it has sprung up.

We have the arranging of musical scores, the providing of cue sheets, the selling of photoplay music and the art of autographing. Little is known regarding the all-around efficiency of autographing, and until "Music for the Pictures" became of vital importance nothing had been heard of it. In the few short years since the exhibitors awoke to the fact that good music meant larger box-office receipts the autographing of scores has been brought to a high plane. In fact Charles Grelnert, a pioneer in this industry, has built up a large and successful business along these lines.

Connected with G. Schirmer, Inc., he followed its growth from its earliest infancy, continually improving upon the old methods and experimenting with new fluids. Later branching out for himself he procured a suitable building for his needs and installed up-to-date machinery, and no longer is there the long delays in procuring printed music.

Mr. Grelnert's assistance has proven invaluable in the compiling of some of the well known picture scores, as his long experience has given him a keen insight into the needs of the picture musician.

We can expect many great developments in the music of the future, but the art of autographing will always stand predominant as the mechanical stepping-stone to greater efficiency in picture playing.

Composer Inspired by Aurora Borealis.

Just as the Marseillaise came through the disturbed conditions of the eighteenth century, so "Pershing's March" was inspired in the lonely heart of a soldier's mother. Mrs. A. S. Watt, who has contributed her share of stalwart sons to fight for democracy, is a musician of peculiar temperament. She lives by and for her music and writes only occasionally as inspiration impels.

One evening while she was visiting in the Thousand Islands a beautiful Aurora Borealis appeared in the north. Always a lover of the artistic, she was held spell-bound by its grandeur. Going to her piano she improvised the theme which is heard in her famous march. Her friends liked it and music critics implored her to publish it. The result has been that wide popularity accorded "Pershing's March."

Questions Answered—Suggestions Offered.

Q WHERE can I procure some classical music that will fit pictures? I have been playing all the Hurrys and Agitatos that are sold, and I find that our patrons are desiring a better class of music. Please help me with your kind suggestions.

A. Almost any of the recognized music publishers can supply you with what you want. You have not stated the size of your orchestra or whether you need only piano or organ selections, and this makes it difficult to specify particular numbers suitable for picture playing. There are many works of Wagner, excerpts from Beethoven and Schubert, many standard Overtures, and practically all the Grand Opera selections, which provide an adequate musical setting for pictures. They can be obtained, for piano, organ or orchestra, from Schirmer, Ditson or Fischer.

Q. Help! My orchestra leader has decided to strike and call out his men. They are non-union and considered the best players in this little town. The leader realizes that he can demand any salary and get it or I shall be forced to dispense with my orchestra. This is not the first raise I have been forced into, and I would be pleased to know what you could suggest that would bring them to their senses.

A. Buy an organ. This will effectually cure the strike-bee sting. If you get an organ cut down your orchestra and play both. If the orchestra decide to leave, you will then not be placed in a position where you have no music. The organ in itself will find favor with your patrons, and if your orchestra behave and act in concert with the organist you will have a fine combination that will have an added box office value. Another method might prove effective if feasible. Try to get a Union orchestra. The rates are fixed and you will have no re-occurrence of the dissension now prevailing.

Q. Kindly advise where I can get collection of music for pictures, any suggestions appreciated.

A. There has been formed the Belwin Music Co., which handles all classes of photoplay music and a large assortment of the standard pieces. They are a little cheaper than the publishing houses and yet they can supply you with everything that has been published. Their address is the Columbia Theatre Building, New York City.

Q. Could you tell me who were the great violin makers of the fifteenth century.

A. Stradavaris, Amati and Guarneri. Of the three, Stradavaris was regarded as the best, and his violins are almost priceless at the present day.

Q. What is a Tympanon?

A. This instrument dates back into the fourteenth century, and was played extensively in the days of Louis XIX. It is a cross between a harp and a xylophone in that it has the strings of the harp placed horizontally and is played much as the xylophone by striking the strings with small hammers. The leading exponent of today of the Tympanon is Sascha Votlichenko.

Q. There does not seem to be any improvement in cue sheet service, although an article of yours in a recent issue brought to the attention of the producers the inadequacy of most cue sheets as prepared today. Truthfully, ninety per cent. of them are of no use whatever, and something should be done to either improve the service or else stop the waste of money. Can't someone get at the men "bigger up" and point out to them the absolute uselessness of the so-called "service" they are paying for?

A. In almost every issue of the Moving Picture World we have hammered this subject of cue sheets, and yours is one of many like complaints. The most direct route to better service is to send your kick to the executives of the companies at fault. These men are busy men, and may never read all that is printed about cue sheets, and it is a "moral certainty" that the guilty offender is not going to bring the matter of his shortcoming to the attention of these executives. Although they are busy they will welcome any reasonable suggestion or just complaint that might tend to improvement in any of their service departments.

Q. I note in the papers Walter Damrosch is to take a symphony orchestra overseas to play at the rest camps under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. Is it a fact that the musicians services are being contributed gratis as a patriotic act or are they in the pay of the Govern-

A. All expenses and salaries of the musicians who are going abroad are paid out of a fund for that purpose in connection with the Y. M. C. A. Mr. Walter Damrosch is contributing his services free.

Q. How are the back-stage effects worked and what do they consist of in productions like "Hearts of the World?"

A. Cues are given to the electricians, and by watching the screen action from behind the screen or from the wings they are able to exactly synchronize all the effect. The instruments used off stage are usually a big drum for shots, wind machine, water machine, sand blocks, and ratchet.

Q. I visited a picture house where the orchestra consists of piano, two first violins, and cello. The violins were not together, the cellist could not be heard, and the pianist was right there with the "drown-out" stuff. For four pieces could not a better combination be used, and what would you suggest? I am a violin leader, but I would hate to think my fiddle sounds as weird as the two "first" in that theatre.

A. This is a good combination of instruments for an orchestra of four, and because of their had execution we can hardly blame the instrumentation.

This is a fine ballad, admirably adaptable as a theme. Leaders will find it a most welcome addition to their libraries. It can be used as a violin, cello, cornet or flute solo with orchestral accompaniment.

Music for the Picture

Conducted by GEORGE W. BEYNON

Our Message Meets with Instant, Hearty and Spontaneous Response

COMMUNITY singing has swept the country in every conceivable form and the enthusiastic reception of our Patriotic Song Singing idea, as outlined in these columns in the issue of August 3, has been extremely gratifying. Exhibitors everywhere have seen its merits and propaganda purposes, its innovation appeal and its advertising possibilities. Theatres all over the country are adopting this educational feature and placing it in the best possible position on their programs.

The Strand of New York has made it a part of its show and works in a lecturer, who gives the history of the song selected for that week. Pretty lighting effects are brought into play and the audience becomes imbued with the idea by the time the speaking is over. Booklets, in which the words and music are printed, are handed to the patrons. Then led by a singer, the audience sings the song about which it has just heard.

This method of application is not altogether what it should be. There is a distinct reluctance upon the part of a large body of people to sing where they can be seen by their neighbor. In order to read the words, the house must be lighted. The singer cannot be heard far back and the baton of the musical director is the only guide to tempo. This means watching the leader and trying to read the music at the same time, by no means an easy task even when attempted by musicians. The use of song slides would overcome the difficulty. We suggest that, immediately after the lecture, a tableau be shown, followed by the projecting of a word slide with darkened house. This will mean better singing and more patriotic inspiration.

The Eighty-First Street Theatre on Broadway holds a short song fest every performance, the people being requested to sing while the splendid orchestra leads them. When the writer was present, a slide was thrown on the screen called, "A Prayer for Our Soldiers," sung to the tune of America. The volume of sound was mighty inspiring as everybody joined in lustily, but we believe that the education angle is of sufficient importance to restrict the songs to patriotic hymns or American folksongs. However, it frequently happens that one week's program will show a patriotic trend, while the program of the following week will lean toward the educational entirely.

Under the direction of Frank Buhler, the Stanley Theatre in Philadelphia has had fine results in community singing for some time and the work is progressing more rapidly than was anticipated. The patrons have learned the songs and are now singing "by heart" pieces that hitherto they have known by name only. The fine orchestra at the Stanley makes an excellent accompaniment, and the people have taken up the innovation in a serious manner. Judged from the standpoint of the box-office receipts, which are usually light in the summer season, it has been a success.

The Alhambra Theatre in Milwaukee is right up to the minute in this matter. Frank Carberry of Chicago leads the singing for twenty minutes in each performance, the words being thrown on a screen, so that all can readily read them. Only patriotic and folksongs are used. This is the nearest approach to our original idea that has thus far come to our attention. Let the good work go on.

On September twenty-eighth, there will be launched a new Liberty Loan drive. Now is the time to get your people interested in community singing, so that it may become a mighty factor in collecting six billion of dollars for the propagation of the war. Little speaking will be necessary if the people join heartily together in song, for as Cicero said:

"The songs of musicians are able to change the feelings and conditions of a state."

We received an interesting letter from Mr. W. W. Houston, Chairman of the Four Minute Song Men, offering the services of this splendid organization in furthering the movement. In every state there is a branch of this organization and the exhibitor has no excuse for overlooking the opportunity of obtaining voices trained specially for this work. Mr. Houston writes:

My Dear Mr. Beynon:

I have been very much impressed by the article entitled "Let's Sing" in the issue of August 3 of Moving Picture World.

The organization of which I am chairman, the Four-Minute Song Men, was formed some months ago for propaganda purposes. It now numbers some 75 men, with many exceptional voices. These men, like the Four-Minute Speakers, are all volunteers, and have time and again demonstrated their efficiency, as well as that of music as an agent of patriotic propaganda.

In your article you say that it may be necessary at first to obtain the services of a professional singer to lead the people, as there seems to prevail a timidity among the laity to show their vocal accomplishments in public. We are just such an organization as would be needed to meet this difficulty, and we would be delighted to co-operate with managers of moving picture theatres in New York City in singing for and with the people.

The songs we sing might be grouped under four heads:

1. National Anthems of the Allies.
2. American Folk Songs.
3. Fine Choral Compositions.
4. Songs which have become popular during war.

Yours very truly,
WM. W. HOUSTON,
Chairman Four-Minute Song Men.

A practical demonstration of the idea does not mean a large investment and the results will more than compensate the live exhibitor who gets busy at once. If the other fellow has already adopted the plan in your town, that does not mean that you should shy at it. Remember that the purpose is national, not local. It is patriotic propaganda clothed in melody with the additional incentive of being education.

From our earliest childhood, we were imbued with a love of country through the patriotic singing in the school-room. The churches are responding to the cry and are instituting a service of song. The most progressive department stores in our large cities assemble the employees and devote a few minutes each day to singing our national airs. Shall the Motion Picture industry, still only a child, and the fifth largest industry in the world, be left behind in this splendid work? When we sing, we are happy and a happy nation is a patriotic nation. Again we say: "Let's sing!"

Strand Musical Program Too "Peppy."

Boy, page Harold Edell! He's not in? We thought not.

The absence of the genial managing director evidently accounts for the infirmities of the performance of the week of August 18. It opened fairly well, the overture being Flotow's "Stradella." Under the baton of Conductor Edouarde, it took on its usual rhythmic beauty and was greeted with applause.

As indicated by its name, a march is for marching—it is not for running. The tempo of marching soldiers is about 100, while processions or parades seldom exceed 85. The Strand topical review was played at 155, but sounded about 420. It resolved itself into a speed and dexterity contest in the orchestra. The vilest hurdy-gurdy we have ever heard sounded really pleasant in comparison. The violin solo, Faust's "Fantasie" by Gounod, played by Mlle. Zentay, was very pleasing in itself, but the orchestra made life miserable for the soloist. They could scarcely be regarded as accompanying the artist, as their efforts did not in any way coincide with hers. Pure carelessness, that's all!

The feature, "Our Mrs. McChesney," consisted chiefly of a musical setting devoted to the organ and the ringing of a telephone—the latter never in time.

However, there was one shining gem of artistry offered to the patrons of the Strand which ameliorated their sufferings. Grace Hoffman contributed Polonaise from "Mignon," by Thomas, with a style of production which brought forth thunderous applause. Miss Hoffman is a true coloratura soprano who sings with perfect ease and great beauty of tone.

The comedy, "Know Your Neighbor," was well handled musically. The film told the story of family disruptions caused by a piccolo. Naturally the piccolo played the chief role. Under a lesser artist, the setting would have been a continuous hodge-podge of piccolo, victrola and saxophone effects, but Mr. Edouarde only permitted it in the opening scenes, where it captivated the audience.

The usual organ solo closed.

Brooklyn Rialto Music Wins Applause. "SIXTY THOUSAND MEN ARE MAKING CANDY!"

This is the greeting we received from Robert Robertson, Managing Director of the Rialto Theatre in Brooklyn. The exclamation is indicative of the man. First comes his patriotism, then his art and, lastly, his shrewd Scotch business acumen. By his untiring efforts, the Rialto Theatre, in Brooklyn, has risen from a neighborhood house to an automobile rendezvous. Seating 1,800, it shows the finest class of pictures and has consistently refrained from the running of double features in spite of the fact that this is the general policy of the opposition. Mr. Robertson depends upon the little artistic touches and frequent innovations to make his show interesting to his patrons.

We had the pleasure the other evening of reviewing a rather remarkable performance. The feature was "Old Wives for New," admirably set to music by Director Weiss. This boy is endowed with marked talent for violin virtuosity and has a keen insight into the demands of feature fitting.

Carrying out the atmosphere and idea of the picture, Mr. Weiss arranged an orchestra fantasia which the orchestra played as an overture. It consisted of, and was programmed as, "Old Songs for New." It opened with "Come Back to Erin" and the Irish flag was projected upon the tableau curtain. This brought a spontaneous hand from the lovers of the Emerald Isle. Following with a violin solo of "Annie Laurie" with a spot light upon the soloist, and red, white, blue and green lighting effects, representing the Scotch plaid, it reached the hearts of those whose fathers wore the "tartan." America was represented by "Silver Threads Among the Gold," the American flag being projected to the great delight of the audience. Next came a cornet solo of "Last Rose of Summer," when we were shown the Union Jack. As the solo progressed, the house lights dimmed away and, when darkness came, the orchestra broke into "Auld Lang Syne," the flags of the Allies covered the large curtain and the audience burst into the song, the climax bringing the house flooded with light.

We have heard applause and applause. But never before in a picture house have we seen people rise and yell at the conclusion of an offering of this sort. The action speaks for itself and for the clever ingenuity of the Managing Director. Mr. Robertson has done great things. He will do greater and the future will hear of him in no uncertain or mediocre manner.

"America" Never Became National Hymn

This fact seems a bit surprising when one takes into consideration the dignity of the music and the patriotic spirit of the lines. But there are probably two very good reasons why the song we have all sung and loved since childhood has never been elevated to the dignity of recognition as emblematic of our national spirit. The words are sectional, breathing the atmosphere of New England alone, and the music is foreign.

Although the way in which we received it is a matter of history, the origin of the tune has always been shrouded in mystery and not a few controversies have been held on the subject. Most authorities now concede the honor to Henry Carey, the composer of "Sally In Our Alley." It was first given a public hearing in 1740, later being adopted as the national hymn of England. Afterward several Continental powers adapted the music to their own patriotic words and made it representative.

For ourselves, it came into being in the year 1832. Samuel Francis Smith, a graduate of Harvard in the class that gave so many brilliant men to the nation, was, at the time, a divinity student at Andover. A friend brought him a book of German melodies and requested him to translate them. Mr. Smith glanced over the contents of the little volume. The air of "God Save the King" arrested his attention. He read the German words. Then, under the inspiration of the moment, on a scrap of paper, he wrote, not a translation, but an entirely original American set of words.

Mr. Smith was born in Boston in October, 1808. He was twenty-three years of age when he wrote the hymn and lived to be over eighty-seven. He was a Baptist clergyman, Professor of Colby College, a teacher and an editor. But the patriotic hymn, hastily scribbled, laid away and forgotten for many months, elevated him and set him apart from the vast family of Smiths. It placed him among the men whose names cannot become common and who never die.

Speaking of the success of his work, Mr. Smith said: "If I had anticipated the future of it, doubtless I would have taken more pains with it. But, such as it is, I am glad to have contributed this mite to the cause of American freedom."

At a reunion of the famous Harvard Class, Oliver Wendell Holmes read a poem dedicated to his classmates. He referred to the author of "America" in these words:

"And there's a youngster of excellent pith,
Fate tried to conceal him by naming him
Smith."

Many years later, at another banquet, Dr. Holmes again eulogized Mr. Smith. He pointed out the cleverness and wisdom in writing "My Country 'Tis of Thee," instead of speaking in the plural. As he said, every time we sing these words we feel a personal ownership and responsibility in our native land that any generalities, however glittering, would not convey to our minds.

Edward Everett Hale relates the circumstances under which he first heard "America." He also unconsciously gives us a charming picture of himself as a boy at the same time. On July 4, 1832, when he was ten years of age, he had spent all his pocket money for the joys of the day and was wandering aimlessly along, wondering how he could live through the remaining hours before bedtime. Passing a church, he heard a choir of five hundred voices blended in singing a hymn which was new to his ears. He entered the church. Thus, by the merest chance, he was present at the first public recognition of the hymn national enough to be called "America."

The Rivoli Presents a Splendid Bill.

During the week commencing August 18, the Rivoli Theatre offered for its patrons one of the finest programs we have had the pleasure of reviewing for some time. There was a sweet simplicity to it that made it soothing in its effect and fulfilled the true mission of refined entertainment.

"Finlandia," by Sibelius, was the overture rendered under the baton of Mr. Rapee. "Finlandia," called by its composer "a tone poem for orchestra," first saw the light in 1894. This was before Finland had been merged into Russia, thus losing part of its musical identity. The atmosphere has nothing Russian in it and the overture truly portrays the Finnish spirit. The Rivoli Symphony Orchestra played it remarkably well, especially the first and second movements. The last movement, which is a grandiose form of the first motive, lacked the fervor of triumph.

"A Sun Kissed Isle" showing scenes in Grenada was well fitted by music that smacked of the Oriental, not too Oriental but just suggestive of a different clime and people.

Following this, the curtains parted showing a prettily robed woman reclining upon the steps outside the church. On either side was the shadows of the holy edifice while overhead the blue sky showed clear save for one bright star. Alberto Bachman played his own composition called "Meditation on Bach's First Prelude" accompanied by organ and harp. Bach's first prelude is the basic of Gounod's "Ave Maria," and for that reason there was a reminiscent melody running throughout the piece. Mr. Bachman did not do himself justice in his playing, but it was acceptable as an offering because of the unique stage setting and the newness of the idea. We would suggest that the lady refrain from dazzling the eyes of the audience with her diamond ring. One star is enough.

The pictorial was played with that careful interpretation upon which Mr. Rothapfel insists. Personally editing it, he gets the underlying thought and his choice of music is always very exacting. The singing of the "Marsailaise" was most effective in that the orchestra sang it in perfect synchrony with the French scene. Their singing of "Hail, Hail, the Gang's All Here," although perfectly correct from the standpoint of picture fitting, met with some unfavorable comment because of its vulgarity.

Josephine Garavelli sang the "Waltz Song" from Gounod's "Mireille." We refrain from criticising this lady until she has had more experience along these lines.

One outstanding feature of the setting for "Heart of the Wilds" was the use of "The Story of a Rose" as a theme. Nothing could be more fitting. It was softly hummed by the audience and when Professor Swinnerton wove into it strange and beautiful contrapuntal melodies it took upon itself a style that was luscious. The entire setting was fine and the orchestra seemed to enjoy it as much as the patrons.

"The Mikado" selections, played by the orchestra as an entr'acte, the comedy, and organ solo closed a splendid show.

Rev. James H. Darlington, Composer.

Our boys in the trenches are no less valorous because they dream of the day when they can go back home. This element of the soldier's psychology was recognized by the Reverend James H. Darlington, Bishop of Harrisburg, when he wrote "We'll Be Going Home."

The Bishop has several sons and nephews already in the service, and he felt that the fighting men needed a home-going song. He has made an exception in the general rule, whereby we, for the most part, speak of the soldiers and sailors—always slighting the boys in blue in favor of the army lads, a fact which the navy has felt for some time.

These publishers have also shown their interest in the suggestion of the Moving Picture World, to the effect that the motion picture theatres can serve a patriotic purpose by encouraging "Community Singing." Accordingly, the publishers have had a number of projection slides made of this song and any moving picture theatre which secures a copy of the orchestration and the song may have a slide without charge upon request, as will be seen in their advertisement on another page of this issue.

The publishers are keeping in touch with the leaders of the motion picture orchestras and they maintain a general supply service of a rather intimate and personal nature, not only throughout this country, but with many blanket orders for shipments to Cuba, Porto Rico and South American orchestras.

This house has been quick to recognize the value of the suggestion of the Moving Picture World as to the use of high class songs as themes in connection with the pictures, and are preparing some song orchestrations of several of their most popular numbers.

The Moving Picture World hopes that the houses will take advantage of this opportunity to give a good trial to "Community Singing," and send in for a slide of "We'll Be Going Home" before the supply is exhausted. The popularity of the song has been most gratifying both to the publishers and the author and they are most anxious that theatres introducing "community singing" shall have access to it.

Refile your setting immediately after your last performance, otherwise you will find difficulty in selecting the music for your next show.

Let there be no casualty list in your orchestra. Bad music alone will draw a fusillade from the audience.

If your neighbor annoys you by playing false notes, there is no necessity for adding to the dissonant effect by imitating him in self-defense.

A SINGING SLOGAN

Come on! Come on! Come on across the Sea,
To fight for Liberty,
To set the whole world free.
Come on! Come on! We're going to see it through,
With honor to the Red, White and Blue.

Given a problem, don't sbrk it or leave it for the other fellow. Solve it yourself, and, in the solution of it, you will raise the standard of your art.

Don't break off your music abruptly. It hurts the ear of the audience.

The success of your work depends upon the friendly and co-operative spirit exhibited in your orchestra.

Music for the Picture

Conducted by GEORGE W. BEYNON

Synchronizing Your Music Score Means Perfect Feature Fitting

THE slowly progressing evolutions in picture playing are bringing forth the quintessence of musical art to add to the beauties of the screened drama. There have been eras as distinctive in picture music as those which marked musical history.

First, we had the "slappity-bang" noise created by piano and drums operated by alleged musicians. Because musically inclined people shunned the "movies" of that day, it mattered little whether the racket fitted the scenes or not. It was only another feature to use in the "bally-hoo" of the loud-lunged lout who called for patrons to his species of side-show. When something new had to be found, the illustrated songs were added to the puerile program, but its accompaniment remained as vile as before.

Hanging tenaciously to the edge of precipitous ruin, pictures pulled themselves not only to safety over the ledge, but to prominence. Cultured people perceived its claim to merit as clean entertainment and began to patronize the "movies."

This was the beginning of the second era or transition in the realm of picture music. Catering to the better classes meant providing real music and small orchestras took the place of the erstwhile piano-drums combination. The orchestra played music chosen while the picture was being screened. There was no attempt to suit the situations, but dreamy, sweet, popular melodies lulled the people into a pleasant frame of mind.

Picture producers saw the possibilities in music and brought on the third period by providing cue sheets for the orchestra leader. These gave the cues to start a certain kind of musical effusion, and served the purpose of portraying the emotions of the scene depicted. Of course, the first few were weird indeed, viewed in the light of later advancement, but they served the purpose in that they taught the musician to analyze his picture.

Then came the call for musical scores, specially synchronized and arranged to minutely interpret every inch of the film. The plan proved successful beyond the most rosy expectations and the producers clamored for composers. Scores by the hundreds were arranged and sent the exchanges. Here they remained, for the exchanges employed no musicians to handle that department. Some exhibitors received the benefit of them by insistent demand, but, in the large majority of cases, they were blissfully ignorant of the new method of enhancing a picture. No publicity was given the movement and it drifted into spasmodic and sporadic attempts. The light dimmed into fickle flickerings and is still flickering.

In the meantime, the playing of pictures generally has advanced upon the basis of the cue sheet. Although it is well-nigh impossible to cue a picture and provide at one and the same time suitability and synchrony, the cue sheets have materially helped the leader to offer an adequate accompaniment. Until recently, he has not attempted to synchronize his music to the picture, feeling that the obstacles were insurmountable.

We have now reached what might be called the Synchrony Era. All the larger theatres make it a special feature of their settings. The Rialto and Rivoli orchestras in New York have brought this point to a very high standard. Not only is the musical setting synchronized for the feature picture, but the Pictorial Review and the Scenic receive just as careful treatment. The pleasure derived by the auditors is thus materially increased. There is no breaking of phrases, no harsh clashes of extraneous keys. Every number fits the situation upon the screen, each theme is clearly defined, and, as the curtain rings down upon the picture, one feels that the music has been cohesive and coherent.

What does it mean? Nothing if not a perfect score. The musical setting, cued from the picture, chosen from standard numbers in the musician's library, carefully cut to fit the length of scene, becomes a musical score perfectly synchronized. Thus, while the light may flicker with the producer, the exhibitor is feeding it oil and making strong the flame of art.

There can be only one ultimate result. It may come in some unusual form. It may be that the time is not yet, but sooner or later, the photoplay must carry with it a musical score to make it appealing to the smaller exhibitor. The larger theatres have facilities for providing their own scores and are utilizing them. This straw shows which way the wind blows.

Oh, for a prophetic vision to see the wonders of the music of the future! Filmcraft developed to the highest degree and enveloped in musical beauty, what a combination! A clean, educational, artistic form of entertainment to recreate the body, mind and morals! Let's all strive for it!

The secret of synchrony lies not so much in the careful timing of the selections as in the accurate judgment of the musical director. Music need not be cut up to fit the situations, but if care be taken in the finishing of phrases the musical setting becomes cohesive, one complete whole that conveys to the audience that sense of unity so essential to plot portrayal.

An Open Letter to the Photoplay Musicians.

ALL we can say to the many letters of congratulation is the time-worn yet time-honored THANK YOU. "Music for the Pictures" has found itself and in its enlargement is finding every leader in the country.

We have received more kind words from musicians than would seem possible. Space does not permit us to publish these letters at present, but, from time to time, we expect to print some of them.

Boys, we sincerely appreciate your hearty co-operation and take pleasure in dedicating these columns to the picture playing musicians of America. It is a delight to note the deep interest taken in our work and we can assure you all, that it is an incentive to greater endeavor.

This portion of the Moving Picture World belongs to you and your interests, and we are depending upon you to assist us in making it the success for which we all hope. Without your hearty support, it will lose its usefulness and become of no value to you nor to ourselves. From the spontaneous response elicited upon the first issue, we know that you appreciate its merit and believe in its service facilities. This is a fine beginning. We want to hear from all the leaders, organists, and piano players in the country.

We do not aim to please ourselves nor strive to glorify our name. We want to help you solve the problems of picture playing, keep you abreast of the times, and serve you with implements of warfare—the cue sheets. We court constructive criticism and welcome your suggestions. Nothing gives us more pleasure than to be called into consultation.

Again thanking those who have been so kind in their felicitations and assuring you of our deep interest in the personal welfare of each, we are,

Yours musically,
GEORGE W. BEYNON.

Votichenko Dedicates New Composition.

The eminent Russian musician, Sacha Votichenko, who is said to be the only exponent of the tympanon, which used to be such a popular instrument in the days of King Louis XIV, has dedicated his new series of Russian and Polish folk lore to Madame Petrova. These selections are now being arranged for full orchestra, and will be played between the acts when Madame Petrova returns to the speaking stage in October. She is to appear in a new play by herself and W. E. Roberts, author of "Dwellers in Glass Houses" and other successful productions on the English stage.

Rialto Theatre Turns To Oratorio Solos.

We have heard ballads, mushy and touching; popular songs, patriotic melodies, classic effusions, and grand operatic arias, but it remained for the Rialto to introduce oratorio selections. You may think that the theatre is no place for sacred song, but had you heard the enthusiastic reception accorded Lorrie Grimaldi, a basso, singing "Shall I In Mamre's Fertile Plain" from Joshua, your opinion would be altered.

Stepping quietly upon the stage, in a dim light, and accompanied only by the organ, Mr. Grimaldi rendered this famous bass solo in a most acceptable manner. It is true his diction was a bit faulty and his enunciation rather poor, yet his interpretation and cantabile style won the hearts of the audience.

The overture, American Fantasie, played by the Rialto Orchestra and conducted by Nat Finston, proved pleasing. The fact that it was not finished, but blended into the march which opened the Animated Weekly made it more interesting. This method robs the director of merited applause, but has the advantage of carrying the show along more briskly.

The musical opening to "The Hun Within," a feature of intense dramatic value, was, to say the least, surprising. Light and of popular trend, it naturally gave the impression that we were to see a comedy drama. The early part of the picture was very light in character and that may have excused the bright introduction, but in view of the fact that the introduction was changed immediately after the characters had been listed and another light intermezzo took its place, we believe that a heavy dramatic prelude would have proved more effective. At least it would create the proper atmosphere and afford a splendid contrast.

The playing of selections from "You're in Love" was very "draggy," making the number altogether too long for comfort. Portions of it were delightful and the trio arrangement of the theme for cello, harp and organ was exceptionally well done. Mention might be made of the lighting effects.

The comedy and organ solo closed the bill. At the organ consul George Crook offered a "Concert Overture in C Minor" by Hollins in a manner that clearly placed George in the foreground of the picture organists. He is good and will become one of the greatest organists in the industry.

Popular Song Featured at the Broadway.

To the strains of "March Slave," by Tschalkowski, played by The Broadway Concert Orchestra, we were ushered by the prettiest lady to a cool and secluded seat. We liked the overture in its interpretation and rendition generally, but the drummer annoyed us. He seems to hold a grudge against the famous Russian composer, for he banged the daylights out of his timpani evidently from sheer cussedness. This was not nice of him. Besides, it spoiled the pleasure of the auditors.

While passing, it might be noted that this aggregation of men are known and programmed as a Concert Orchestra. This speaks well for the management in this day when three pieces are loudly heralded as a Symphony Orchestra. And it must be remembered that the orchestra comprises sufficient men to play symphonic works.

The organ solo, programmed as "The Courts of Jamshyd," was not played. Something else must have been substituted or our memory of melodies is playing us a trick. Mr. Johnston is a good man at the consul and the people appreciated whatever he was playing. The fact that he did not finish it seemed to make little difference.

The best thing on the bill was the singing of the popular song, "As Washington Crossed The Delaware, So Pershing Will Cross The Rhine." The gentleman who perpetrated this number lays no claim to artistry, but his enunciation was clear and his voice pleasing. During the song, two tableau effects, emblematic of the two periods—1776 and 1918—were given with beautiful lightings. The first showed Washington and his little band as they crossed the Delaware River, while the second displayed Pershing leading his heroes in Hunland. It was well staged and most effective.

"Crashing Through to Berlin" proved interesting from the picture standpoint, but disappointing from the musical angle. After a feature has been run a week, there should be no excuse for non-synchrony. The sudden breaks and crashes are things of by-gone days in picture setting and those who carelessly persist in offering poorly synchronized scores mark themselves as antiquated.

The use of Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance," filled with hope and triumph, was

One of the First "Floral Horse-shoes."

Mr. George W. Beynon,
Musical Editor,

My dear Mr. Beynon:

Congratulations to you on your success in making "Music for The Pictures" of special and greater interest to those of us who are engaged in this important line of work, as shown in the MOVING PICTURE WORLD, issue of August 31. Speaking for myself, I must say that you have made a decided acquisition in the interests of good music for the Picture and I am sure that my fellow musicians will all appreciate with me the value of this important addition to the journal, which should make it an incentive to all who are earnest in their desire to raise the musical standard and make it what it should be, namely: a source of pleasure and inspiration to the listener and a real help to the subject presented on the screen.

You have my best wishes for your continued success in the noble work which you have undertaken, this first issue of which reflects great credit on your efforts and good judgment.

With regards to you, I remain,
Very truly yours,
ARTHUR EDWARD JONES,
Theatre and Concert Organist.

hardly warranted in the scene depicting the ruins of Louvain, nor could there be any justification in playing The Marseillaise only part way through. We are proud of France and her warlike achievements and we are glad to pay her just homage when the strains of The Marseillaise are heard, but consider it bad taste and in the nature of an insult to be left sheepishly standing as the number is suddenly broken off in the middle. If played at all, it should be finished, and there was ample time to do so in view of the long sub-title immediately following the scene.

There were many parts of the picture that received a musical interpretation that could not be excelled and with but a few more minor exceptions—such as sixteen bars from the "Hallelujah Chorus," introduced by the organist for the apparent purpose of showing that he knew it—the music fitted. An educational picture is always hard to set, and this feature is especially difficult, so that we must not be too hard on it.

Mr. M. Kashin, who now has charge of the destinies of The Broadway, shows his showmanship in his wonderful lobby displays, his artistic stage settings and house lightings. No doubt the music will improve and we look for big things from The Broadway in the future.

"Dixie" Adopted as a Southern War Song.

One Saturday night in 1859, Daniel Decatur Emmett, a member of the famous Bryant Minstrels, was told that a new "Walk-Around" was wanted before Monday's rehearsal. He attempted it the following day, but the inspiration was lacking. Going to the window and gazing discontentedly out on a down-pour of rain, his thoughts reverted to the Sunny South. He sighed and, turning to his wife, murmured: "I wish I was in Dixie." This expression was a favorite one with the troupe when enduring the Northern winters. As the exclamation passed his lips, he knew he had stumbled on the inspiration he had needed. He seized his violin and soon had the melody worked out.

The song was enthusiastically greeted wherever it was heard. It really had no connection with the war. But it was chosen as a catchy piece to be played at the inauguration of Jefferson Davis. It made a distinct hit and was adopted as a Southern propaganda song. Several war writers tried to change the lyrics so they would have some bearing on the Southern cause, but their efforts did not meet with popular favor and Emmett's words became universal favorites.

Emmett was a Northern man and his sympathies were always with the North. He came of a line of warriors, his grandfather having fought in the Revolution and his father in the war of 1812. For himself, he gave his services to his country in the civil war, going as a player of the fife and later taking up the drum. Yet the simple little song, which has been called the most original of all American national songs, came near being his undoing among his Northern friends. In Secession days, the song was branded as a rebel song, and one editor went so far as to attack Emmett in his paper. A rather amusing story, showing the bitterness and narrowness of the period, is related: It seems that when Emmett was traveling in the South he visited the grave of Stonewall Jackson. Being a very warm day, the old man removed his hat to wipe his brow. The papers made much of the incident and dilated at length on how Daniel Decatur Emmett stood with his head bared and wept at the grave of the Southern general.

What is fame? Surely not monetary gain. During eighty years of honesty, frugality and piety, for Emmett was intensely religious, his returns as a composer amounted to only a very few dollars and obscurity in a little Western town. The man who had the ability to write "Old Dan Tucker" at the age of fifteen and who had the creative talent in a marked degree, could not commercialize his faculty. In his old age, he crept back to Mount Vernon, Ohio, his birthplace, and made his home in a tiny cabin on the outskirts of the town. Here he eked out a scanty living by raising chickens and tilling a garden. A small annuity from the Actor's Fund was a great source of comfort and joy to him.

When he was 79 years old, a minstrel manager conceived the idea that the old gentleman might still be useful as a figure-head in a show. Accordingly he traced Mr. Emmett to the little town where he had become practically lost to the world. Upon inquiry, he was given the following information: "Yes, Dan Emmett lives here. But he never wrote 'Dixie' nor anything else." "A prophet is not without honor—save in his own country."

The artistry of picture playing truly indicates the personality of the leader. Don't offer a slovenly performance, for by it you will be judged.

Music for the Picture

Conducted by GEORGE W. BEYNON

The Secret of Synchronized Scores Calls for Intelligent Co-operation

AN ABSOLUTELY essential feature of a musical score arranged for motion pictures is "Synchrony." That is, the exact timing of accompaniment to score. It is something which everyone in the audience senses, although few probably, except musicians, recognize the factor which obviates sudden stops and jarring changes in the musical setting.

Synchrony, however, as applied to motion picture music, has not yet been reduced to its ultimate perfection. It is at present comparative, depending largely upon the intelligence of the orchestra leader. A correct knowledge of tempo, the completeness of the film as originally set to music, the steadiness of projection and the care of the operator are all contributing factors.

Tempo, is, of course, comparative. Many leaders have their own individual conception of andante, allegro, moderato, etc. But metronome marks are of the utmost importance and should be relied upon wherever quoted.

If the film has been cut, certain scenes will be shorter than the music assigned. This is a frequent occurrence, as the producing companies know to their sorrow. In different states, certain portions of film are not allowed to be shown because of censorship. These portions vary according to the varied minds of the censors. Thus the timing of musical setting with scene may be absolutely perfect in Pennsylvania and entirely at odds in Ohio. Also, there have been operators so enamored of certain scenes from a film that these portions were found to be among the missing when the film reached its next exhibitor.

Another problem in connection with synchrony is purely a mechanical one. The change of the "load" in the electrical current supplied to the projection machines will vary the speed of projection and upset the synchrony of the music. Should the operator, while shifting reels, carelessly thread twenty feet of action through, the music will be that much over. Synchrony is usually based on a schedule projection of 1,000 feet in fifteen minutes. Again we find that projection is comparative and the judgment of the operator is called into play. A difference of one minute per one thousand feet for five reels will tend to seriously disturb the unity of setting and scene.

Furthermore, in synchronizing the original score in the operating room, there is usually a double projection machine and consequently no time is lost between reels. In showing pictures, however, where there is only one machine available, there is necessarily a loss of several minutes consumed by the changing of the film which tends to destroy synchrony unless the leader is watchful.

With a live leader at the head of the orchestra, who takes an intelligent interest in his work, these difficulties can be overcome; but any man who will run through the score, regardless of consequences, will soon find that the scenes on the screen do not coincide with the music assigned in the score. Admittedly, the synchronizing, or exact timing of music and picture, has not yet reached a state of perfection. The method of achieving perfect synchrony may still be open to improvement, but the method now employed will yield wonderful results if faithfully followed.

There are various methods of arranging scores, largely dependent upon the ability and ingenuity of the arranger. Some scores have certain numbers of a definite length properly cued at their commencement. If the selection be long, it makes the work of the musical director more difficult for the first few performances, as his unfamiliarity with the pictures gives him no idea of the tempo necessary to perfect fitting. Other scores use a block system by frequently cueing minor titles or descriptions at points where they will coincide with the music. This method is excellent, for it gives the leader a chance to follow every foot of the film with his eye and bring the music along concurrently. Yet this "cueing" every few bars may be carried to extremes when it forces the musician to read the entire story from his score.

Short numbers are more easily brought to end with the finish of the scene and if long numbers be used, they should be "blocked" by minor cues at least every thirty-two measures.

The "first-run theatres," as a rule, find little difficulty in giving a smooth performance. The film has not been cut and the selected numbers are exactly the same length for each scene. These numbers are in key sequence (A key followed by its relative) so that if a change is forced prematurely it is little noticed. But the difficulties, mechanical and otherwise, which are encountered in the synchronizing of musical settings to motion pictures are problems which are bound to crop up even in the best equipped theatres. The remedy or, in other words, the real "secret of synchrony" is co-operation. Success will follow the efforts of the leader who uses his head, sees that the operator has the basis of synchrony and follows it, and "pulls in" his orchestra as the change of scene and musical setting approaches.

Fair Bill Offered at the Rivoli.

Selections from Puccini's "Madame Butterfly" opened the program at the Rivoli for the week commencing August 25. The Rivoli Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Rappe conducting, played this favorite overture with their usual good sense of rhythm and excellent accentuation.

The program informed us that "Madame Butterfly," founded on Belasco's play, was produced in Milan, February 17, 1904. It was hissed off the stage at the first performance—no one knows why, as Puccini was such a favorite. But several months later it was sung at Brescia, and later in London. It began to make good and has become perhaps the most popular opera of this century.

One of the outstanding numbers of the program was a delightful wonder-piece, "Come Watch With Me the Passing Night." Aside from its being a masterpiece in photographic art, Mr. Van Scoy should be congratulated on the thoughtful compiling of the titles. The musical setting to this number was ideal, the synchrony perfect.

The "Gavotte" from Massenet's "Manon" was interpreted by Mlle. Madeline D'Espinoz, soprano. The audience seemed to enjoy it. They applauded.

The musical setting to the Pictorial was very inspiring. The hand-clapping was reinforced by cheering from the orchestra. However, we did not think the audience needed the "Claque."

Carlo Mejia, tenor-in-fact, we would call it lyricissimo tenor, gave for the audience's approval, "When First the Heavenly Grace," from "La Juive," by Jacques Halevy. He was wise in not choosing a well-known aria, as he might have suffered from comparison. Yet the audience applauded.

Welcome to the feature! It was Cecil B. DeMille's production, "Till I Come Back to You." Its musical setting was a bit monotonous, which is unusual at the Rivoli. While it was always "under the picture," as it should have been, there were times when it did not support adequately.

Professor Swinnen at the organ finished the program with a march by Francois Fetis. At least the program said so. Professor Swinnen's organ numbers usually receive marked attention, although coming in a bad part of the program. But at this performance it appeared to have been played more as a filler, as no lights were shown to show that he was really reading score.

"The Historic Fourth of July in Paris."

During the run of the Red Cross film, "The Historic Fourth of July in Paris," at Poli's Theatre in Wilkes Barre, a very effective musical setting was given the picture by J. J. Galvin, managing director of the theatre. This is probably the first elaborate musical program to be used for a single reel subject in any motion picture presentation outside of New York. Mr. Galvin's program was as follows:

"The Star Spangled Banner," "Pack Up Your Troubles in Your Old Kit Bag," "Like Washington Crossed the Delaware," "Onward Christian Soldiers," "Good Night, Germany," "Keep the Home Fires Burning," and "Rally Round The Flag."

Watch your lights in order that they may not shine into the eyes of your audience, thus spoiling their enjoyment of the picture. When the musicians are not playing, see that all lights are turned out.

The organist is not a machine, but a human being, prone to fleshly weakness. Treat him as YOU would be treated.

If you feature your music to the feature, it's some feat (ure) doing.

"Old Folks at Home" Typically American

Closely associated in our hearts and minds with "Home, Sweet Home," but distinctively more American in its atmosphere, is the subject of this sketch.

Stephen Collins Foster, composer of a great number of songs which have retained their popularity to the present time, was born on July 4, 1826, in the city of Pittsburgh, during the celebration of fifty years of American Independence.

His musical talent asserted itself at an age when children are usually considered infants. When he was only two years old he would place his sister's guitar on the floor and pick out harmonies. At eight he taught himself the flute and a bit later the piano.

One day in 1851 Foster rushed into his brother's office and said: "I have a new song and need the name of some Southern river of two syllables to use in it." They took down an atlas and ran through the pages until they came to a little river in Florida. The name suited. Thus "Way Down Upon the Suwanee River" became a classic.

Cristie, the famous minstrel, bought the right to sing the song before it was published. He also stipulated that one edition at least should bear his name as author and composer.

"Old Folks at Home" has been called the "song of the homesick." Its potency to calm the "Savage Breast" is illustrated in the following anecdote of the Civil War: One of the northern regiments were so discouraged over inactivity and slow pay that they were on the verge of mutiny. Indeed, several of them did break through the lines, and returned again late at night and intoxicated. They refused to obey orders. When even the colonel failed to establish discipline the bandmaster called his men together and told them to play. Soon the strains of "Old Folks at Home" seeped through to the inner consciousness of the half-crazed, despairing soldiers. The melody touched their hearts and the chastened "Boys in Blue" wept themselves to sleep.

Authorities seem agreed that the style of Foster is more distinctive than that of any other American composer. The melody of his songs is simple and the words are always his own. He gave to the world one hundred and seventy-five songs in all. "Old Black Joe," "Massa's in De Cold, Cold Ground" (said to be inspired by his grief over the death of his father), "Old Dog Tray," "My Old Kentucky Home" and "Come Where My Love Lies Dreaming" are his best loved songs. The latter is his most ambitious composition and his own favorite.

So much for the poet and musician! What of the man? Stephen Collins Foster was gentle and kind, adoring his family. But he was also proud and sensitive, resenting the least slight. A woman of his acquaintance once said to a friend: "Tell Stephen to come to my party and to be sure to bring his flute." Foster sent his flute but absented himself. He was an indefatigable worker. Indeed, it was not at all out of the ordinary for him to write a song in the morning, dispose of it in the afternoon and spend the proceeds before bedtime.

When he was only thirty-eight, at the age when most men have not reached the zenith of their careers, his life was snuffed out. He died suddenly at Bellevue Hospital, in New York City. His identity was not known and his body was sent to the morgue. Friends traced it and sent the body back to Pittsburgh to rest where the composer was born. The Shakespearean axiom was reversed in Foster's case, for his strength lives forever and only his weaknesses were interred with his bones.

His passing reminds one in its grim warning of that of one other great American genius, Edgar Allan Poe. Both were aristocrats of Southern antecedents; both spoke in an idiom peculiarly American; each bequeathed to his country poetry that is practically immortal, and neither ever learned to control himself.

We hear so much these days of the idiocyncracies of geniuses. We applaud their achievements and condone their mistakes. But we are overjoyed when we read of the splendid men who have given of their best to the world and have taken nothing beautiful away from it.

"We'll Wallop the Kaiser" Makes Appeal

Another evidence of the entente cordiale existing between those of French and American blood is found in the latest song to make its appearance in New York City, entitled "We'll Wallop the Kaiser," the words being by Mrs. Woodallen Chapman, an American, and the music by Madame Elsa Gregori, a French composer, whose work is even better known upon the continent than in our own land.

The author of the words was, through her ordinary occupation, brought into frequent contact with the boys in the training camps. As a consequence she was given many interesting glimpses of their point of view and something of a knowledge of their characteristic expressions.

The phrase "We'll Wallop the Kaiser" came often to her ears and finally became a sort of refrain that sang itself over and over in her mind. Other phrases began to cluster themselves about it, until finally they seemed to call for some sort of formal expression.

The various experiences that came to her and the phraseology that so appealed to her were related to the composer, who finally went to the piano one day saying, "These words of the boys should be put into song—the kind of song that the boys will love to sing. The music should be bright, catchy, stirring—something like this"—and she played the opening strains of the present well-known song.

Inspired by the music the American woman then took up the task of weaving into poetical form the words so often on the lips of the doughboy himself.

Thus with mutual criticism and encouragement the song was evolved, with the thought always in mind of writing something which the soldier boy himself would enjoy singing and which would serve to raise his spirits when on a long, tiresome hike.

That their aim was accomplished has been proven by the reception given the song by the boys. Its sentiment appeals to them:

"Come boys, help wallop the Kaiser,
Beat him till he's sore;
He says that we're lazy;
We're cowards, we're crazy—
Just watch us make him roar."

It has the right sort of ring to it, for it sounds like business, like sticking at it until the job is done:

"Yes, boys, we'll wallop the Kaiser,
We're bound to win the war.
We'll ram him, we'll jam him,
Eternally slam him—
Then damn him and pound him some more."

Camps in many different parts of the country are being provided with orchestra and band parts and also with slides containing the words, so that all the boys may enjoy the pleasure of singing it in unison.

The cover—a color cartoon by John B. Gruelle—showing the Kaiser's countenance badly damaged by the fists of the Allies, has also been reproduced in colors for the screen, and always brings a roar of applause.

The song has proved itself an inspiring addition to the music of the day and the author and composer may congratulate themselves upon having done a very practical "bit" toward winning the war, for their production cannot fail to increase, in every individual who hears it, the sort of patriotic determination essential to ultimate victory.

Thrown on the screen in a picture theater, it never fails to bring enthusiastic applause, and the air is so easy to follow that audiences soon sing it with great gusto.

New Music Offered at Bargain Prices.

Chappell & Co., realizing that the field of picture playing offers a splendid medium for distribution, and fully aware of the vital importance of this comparatively new vocation, have placed before our readers a proposition that should appeal to every exhibitor, his pianist, organist and musical director. In another column you will find advertised twenty orchestral numbers ranging from waltzes to entracte numbers, for the ridiculously low price of ten cents each, when ordered together.

Everywhere has been heard the cry for "New Music." Managers continually "kick" about constant repetition. Patrons want up-to-the-minute stuff. This galaxy of musical numbers should certainly be welcomed by every hard pressed, worried musician in the country.

"Evensong," "Sunbeams" and "Mother o' Mine" make splendid themes. They are varied in treatment and adaptable to almost any picture. Then you will note that popular Irish song, "Mavourneen Roamin'," sung with such success by Lambert Murphy. It breathes the scent of the Emerald Isle and is prettily arranged for orchestral combinations. "Waiting" is timely and homey, a true prediction of the reward of mothers after the war. Other patriotic numbers are "Allies March to Freedom" and "Laddie in Khaki." "Amaryllis Waltz" is found suggested on many cue sheets and every leader needs it.

Nothing like this has been offered before and it behooves the picture player to take advantage of it at once.

"For Husbands Only" Draws Many Women.

Will the exhibitor never regard his music seriously? He must know that the public demands a form of entertainment in connection with moving pictures that is educational and musical. He surely has learned from the failure of others that the best pictures in the world, the finest advertising stunts and lobby displays, will not hold his patronage if his music is neglected.

The music at the Broadway for the week commencing September 1 could only be classed under the one heading—careless. A grand opera overture—"Barber of Seville"—was programed, but a comic opera selection was played. The organist seemed in a hurry to finish his selection, and although it was one of his own composing, he gave the impression that he hated it.

The cat-calls during the comedy cheapened the performance, detracted from the picture because of their frequency and became an unmitigated nuisance.

The Trio—"Largo"—from Zerxes by Handel was great. The instruments blended well and the tonal balance was evenly distributed. It was real chamber music of the highest order and sparkled—a gem in the crown of music.

"For Husbands Only" was featured as the cinema attraction, but by the number of ladies present one could see that the injunction had not been followed. The music fitted the picture fairly well, but there was no synchrony nor attention paid to relative keys. This spoilt it for us. Nevertheless the people enjoyed the picture and some praised the music.

James C. Bradford, the musical director at the Broadway, is a lovable chap and a fine musician. His experience in picture playing dates back to the early days of the industry and on occasion he has risen to enviable heights in picture scoring. "Jimmie" is well liked by his "boys" and gets lots of work out of his orchestra. With so much ability and loyalty upon which to depend, it seems a shame that a little carelessness should creep into the work of so popular a conductor.

Klaw & Erlanger Road Shows Successful.

"Some Night," Joseph Klaw's new production of Harry Delf's comedy with music, moved last week from the Jersey coast to Boston, where it was splendidly received and scored a quick triumph. Several of the lively song numbers were encored five or six times; notably, "With The Boy I Love," "Alone in a Great Big World," "Something That Money Can't Buy," and "Send Me a Real Girl." The same day, "The Rainbow Girl" opened at the Illinois Theatre in Chicago. This was the company which presented this successful musical piece by Renold Wolf & Louis A. Hirsch at the New Amsterdam and Gaiety theatres in New York this spring and summer. The music for both "The Rainbow Girl" and "Some Night" is published by Witmark & Sons.

Two Popular Irish Songs Featured.

Two of the biggest favorites among the popular Irish songs published by M. Witmark & Sons, are being featured by Joe Morris & Winn Shaw, who are just starting a tour of the Pantages houses of west. These numbers are "My Irish Son of Songs," already made famous by Chaucey Olcott in "Once Upon a Time," and "Twas Only an Irishman's Dream," which is as popular as ever.

Leaders' Service Bureau.

Questions Asked—Suggestions Offered.

OWING to the draft we are minus a piano player and cannot get one.

We have been using a combination consisting of organ, violin, cello and piano. Our organist has been handling the piano and the orchestra has seemed weak without the organ. In your judgment, would you consider it effective or proper to leave out the piano entirely?

A. You have not said whether your organ was a Wurlitzer, Seeburg, Photoplayer or Austin. In any case we believe that you could obtain excellent results in the Feature and probably the scenic, but if you have a church organ we would advise the use of the piano in the Comedy and Pictorial Review. If you are fortunate in possessing one of the others, your entire show could be handled by it and the orchestra.

Q. Why do I continue to have difficulty in obtaining cue sheets? If this service is for us, as you have intimated in your articles, why are the exchanges always out of them?

A. The fault very probably lies with the exchange in their unwillingness to be inconvenienced in the matter of cue sheets. We would advise you to write direct to the producer, and address your letter to their Publicity Department. It will receive instant consideration.

Q. Who is the greatest conductor in the picture industry today?

A. Unfortunately we haven't heard all of them, and our opinion would hardly prove the fact. We are writing you under separate cover, giving you the names of those conductors who are generally regarded as leaders in their profession.

Q. How can I learn of positions open for a musician?

A. Under the heading of classified advertisements in the various trade journals, you will probably find what you want. Look in the MOVING PICTURE WORLD first.

Q. Would it be possible to get results from a ladies' orchestra composed entirely of strings, woodwind and piano?

A. We believe that excellent results can always be obtained from such a combination whether of male or female composition. The larger number the greater the results.

Q. I shall be greatly obliged if you will give me the following information, as I see in your Service Bureau that you answer many questions in regard to music. When was the opera "Salome" first performed in New York City? Who took the role of Salome? How long did the opera run? Thanking you in advance.

A. "Salome" was first produced at the Metropolitan Opera House in 1907, the title role being sung by Fremstad. Some of the women of New York were so shocked that a petition for its withdrawal was circulated, headed, it is said, by Anne Morgan, and sent to the proper authorities, with the result that the danger to New York morals was "scotched but not killed." In the following autumn, Oscar Hammerstein produced the work at his opera house, with Mary Garden as the prima donna, and New York seems to have called for other performances since that time, without any further clamor from society.

Q. Have there been any announcements yet of the operas to be produced next season by the Chicago and Metropolitan opera companies? If so, can you give me a list of them? Will "Le Coq d'Or" be repeated this season?

A. Neither the Chicago nor the Metropolitan companies have as yet announced in full their repertoire plans for the next year. However, Cleofonte Campanini, general director of the Chicago Opera Association, named the revivals which he will undertake next season. They are Donizetti's "Linda di Chamounix," Ricci's "Crispino e la Comare," Rossini's "William Tell," Puccini's "Tosca" with Mary Garden, Verdi's "Otello" and "Falstaff," Bellini's "Norma," Sant-Saens' "Samson et Dalila," and Mozart's "Don Giovanni" with an all-star cast. "Le Coq d'Or," the principal success of the last Metropolitan season, will undoubtedly be given the coming season.

Q. I would like to know the name or names of teachers of the piano who give rather advanced lessons and who hold recitals now and then for the benefit of their pupils. Like most musical people, I think I have the ability and would like to prepare for concert playing. What is the average cost per lesson for such instruction? I am a young girl nineteen years old, working, and will have to pay for it out of my allowance each week.

A. Many of the leading pianists, who appear before the public, receive pupils in advanced work during their days of leisure between engagements. As you say you are working, do you think it will be possible for you to take lessons during the day? Naturally in placing yourself under an artist you would be obliged to make the hours of lessons suit the leisure of the teacher. Have you considered studying at one of the large music schools?

The prices vary. The lowest charge any big teacher makes is $10 per lesson, and the really famous pianists who occasionally teach charge much more. At a music school you could undoubtedly find competent instruction for less.

Is there not some large music school in your own city where you could study in the evening, which would seem to be the best possible time for a worker?

Music for the Picture

Conducted by GEORGE W. BEYNON

The Small Showman Seeks for Surer Service from the Producer

WE MAY dwell upon the wonders of our Rialtos and Strands, talk of the big picture presentations in legitimate theatres, where the "Hearts of the Worlds" draw packed houses, stand with mouth agape and in joyful anticipation when we hear of the million dollar picture palaces promulgated, but—every film manufacturer still loudly, and we might say boisterously, acclaims the little man as "The backbone of the industry."

Now the question arises regarding the proper interpretation of this trite, but true saying. Does the producer purposely raise his voice that the little fellow may hear and pat himself on the back, strengthening a further inclination to do business with him—his bosom friend and philanthropist? Is it an insincerity both polite and politic that calls forth these kindly words without any real feeling in the matter?

"By their good deeds shall ye know them!"

The producer who, in all good faith, firmly believing in the general growth of the picture industry, conscientiously solicits the business of the little fellow, not because he is legion, but from a desire to foster his growth, can rightly claim the best of intentions. Good intentions are praiseworthy, but unless they be carried out, become but a barren field. It is said "Hell is paved with good intentions" and we believe it.

It is not within our province to enter into a discussion involving the general film service offered to the exhibitor. Music is our field and its fences give more than enough room for roaming. Hence to our subject!

The music service offered to the exhibitor is a joke. The intentions of the producer no doubt are the best in the world but his ignorance regarding its importance or essentials is colossal. Would he detail a person to get out his publicity service and then go away and forget all about him? Would he wait for the exhibitor to tell him his service was poor? Would he permit his publicity man to work in his own way, when it suited him and be engaged in similar occupations for others or other occupations for himself? Would the producer never study the publicity question for himself nor familiarize himself with its basic principles?

No, all these things he would not do. To think lightly of the publicity service of his business would spell ruin, yet that is the way he thinks regarding music service. He knows music is important. He knows his pictures either stand or fall by music. He knows that exhibitors help to fill their houses by the added feature of good music. He knows that these same exhibitors pay thousands of dollars yearly to maintain an orchestra and their large music library. Singers of the best type are engaged to enhance the program. These cost money. He knows that his music cue sheets are not used in the large houses because they are in no way adequate nor helpful. He knows that because of this inadequacy he must send a print to the projection room of the big theatre in order that it may be "Screened for music." And, lastly, he knows that the service refused by the big fellow because it is worthless he foists on the little fellow and calls it music service. If it is not service for the big show, we cannot see where it can be used in the smaller theatre to foster growth. If a retrograde movement be desired, this service will certainly help.

Until the producer sees the wisdom of appointing a competent musician on his staff, and regards the question seriously

Dr. Riesenfeld Praises Department.

THE RIALTO, Times Square.
THE RIVOLI, Broadway at 49th st.

September 6, 1918.

Office of the Musical Director.

My Dear Mr. Beynon:

I am much interested in your new department, "Music for the Picture." There is indeed much that can be improved and done to give atmosphere, and not enough can be said or written on the subject. I cannot express any opinion on the performances in other moving picture houses over the country, as I unfortunately never get a chance of hearing them. I can only tell you that my experience is that I find a fresh riddle to solve with each picture we present, and I am sure this must be the case with other conductors and managers, who will greatly appreciate the help you will be able to give them.

Please let me wish you good luck in your new undertaking and let me assure you of any assistance in my power.

Very sincerely yours,

Hugo Riesenfeld.

enough to closely follow it, making comparisons, developing new ideas, and inculcating a unity of purpose between his picture director and music director, "the back-bone of the industry" is going to continue his sufferings.

Musicians who take upon themselves the duty of arranging cue sheets merely to obtain extra cigar money cannot be relied upon to put forth any unusual energy either mental or physical to make the cue sheets productive of good results. It is a side issue in their young lives. Beside the publicity and picayune they derive from it, there is no incentive to greater endeavor.

Those arrangers, subsidized by publishing firms, cannot give service for their scope is limited. Each cue sheet prepared by them has a strange similarity of suggested selections. It is to their advantage to place before the buying directors all those numbers which they desire to popularize and of which they wish to increase the sale. In other words, the producer is paying to advertise the wares of certain publishers. This is not conducive to good music service for the exhibitor.

Suggested musical selections are a vital necessity. Without them, the cue sheet would be abortive, but unless they be chosen without prejudice or favor, and for the sole purpose of interpreting the scene affected, no results can be expected. Loyalty to the interests of producer should be always paramount. Service to the exhibitor should become the foremost thought, followed by concentration upon the technical part of the work. Variety of music is needed. New numbers and up-to-date "Hits" are called for. The musical leader of every picture theatre should be made to feel that he can depend upon the service submitted to him by the film manufacturer.

"John Brown's Body" Marching Song.

Practically all patriotic songs have been created in a period of national stress. A song to fit the time is notably true of "John Brown's Body," which bears the reputation of being the most stirring march-song of the anglo-saxon race.

The simple little ditty had a most humble origin. The tune is supposed to have been composed by William Steffe, a writer of many Methodist hymns. It was used as a camp meeting song long before the civil war, and was very popular with the negroes of the South.

Most of us have clung fondly to the idea that the "John Brown" mentioned in the song was the great emancipator of Harper's Ferry, who died for and because of his convictions. But there is no place in history for sentiment, and we are disillusioned in the most practical manner.

At the outbreak of the Civil War, the melody was launched on its way by a battalion of Infantry occupying Fort Warren in Boston. The company seized upon the old melody as a medium of relieving the tedium of work. The religious nature of the words did not suit the men and they soon began to improvise. There chanced to be in the company a good-natured Scotchman, named John Brown. The name had an appeal, and around him the song centered. It voiced its way into the hearts of the brave and reckless boys and became their marching song on their way to the front.

In December of 1861, Julia Ward Howe was in Washington. One day she saw a skirmish between troops near the city. There she heard for the first time the song which had become so popular among the Northern soldiers. She went home and wrote the lyrics beginning "Mine Eyes Have Seen the Glory of the Coming of the Lord," and her composition has come down to us as "The Battle Hymn of The Republic."

It would be impossible to conceive of a greater contrast than existed between the inane jingle of the army and the stately words of Mrs. Howe. But the music answered a two-fold purpose in the complex life of a soldier. He could march weary miles chanting the former, and could lay down his life for his country, breathing the faith voiced in the latter.

The surprising popularity of the song is attested by the fact that it has been made the marching song of Great Britain. It was sung with great enthusiasm by Kitchener's soldier's in the Soudan, and by Robert's troops in South Africa. It was discarded by our men in the Spanish war, where the North marched shoulder to shoulder with the South. That was indicative of good-taste and delicacy of feeling. All felt that the "John Brown" words were too reminiscent of days long dead. None of the splendid body of fighting men of the now ideally merged United States cared to resurrect a sentiment that was better buried in the ground along with the Scotch John Brown and the great man of the same name who gave up his life for an ideal.

Interesting Music Heard at the Rialto.

The Rialto program for the week commencing Sunday, Sept. 8, opened with the Overture, "Solonelle" by Tschaiakowsky. Mr. Riesenfeld and his orchestra fairly outdid themselves in this number. The audience showed their approval by giving both conductor and orchestra an ovation.

The musical setting for the scenic, "Punting With Sugar," followed out the Rialto standard for detail—even to sweet melodies.

Annie Rosner, soprano, made the most of a song called "Mine" by Solman. The gentleman conducting the orchestra seemed to have a little difficulty in following the singer. Whether it was the singer's fault or the fault of the conductor, it was hard for us to judge.

The "Prologue from I Pagliacci was given by Desere La Salle, baritone. Just why the aria was not finished, we do not know. Possibly because the average audience has the wrong idea of where the ending of the aria really is, and applauded too soon. But we would suggest that an aria should be finished and in time patrons will realize their mistake.

The feature, "The Law of the North," afforded an atmospheric musical setting, which was admirably done. It is very unfortunate that the number following the feature is always spoiled by so many of the audience leaving. As a suggestion—why not hold up this number a bit as at any concert, until the new arrivals are seated. It will surely be appreciated by those remaining. These two charming numbers "Irish Tune From County Derry" and "Shepherd's Hey" were absolutely lost. Even the men in the orchestra were affected and did not play as carefully as usual under Mr. Riesenfeld.

The comedy "His Wife's Friend," followed by "Marche Religieuse" by Guilmant with Arthur Depew at the organ, closed a very delightful program.

Rosey Hits Added to Belwin Catalogue.

Belwin, Inc., again, in the short months of its existence, is proving to the musical world that it intends being an important factor in the industry. Much progress has been made in its catalogue. Its latest scoop is to secure the entire catalogue, with the exception of his albums, of George Rosey, the well known publisher, composer and arranger.

Among the many hits may be mentioned, "Valse Divine," a most impressive waltz; "Valse Moderne," the captivating hesitation waltz of the day; "Golden Youth," a charming characteristic valse lento; "A La Mode," a characteristic French one-step; "Savannah," a thrilling one-step, which has an unusually catchy melody; "Sachem," a sensational Indian one-step, just the kind for dancing and pictures; "Military Tactics," which will hereafter be known as the representative favorite for patriotic music; "A Selection of Favorite Melodies," a medley arrangement of excerpts from famous and standard works.

Within a few days, an important announcement will be made of a unique and special offer to musicians. This offer will last only for a limited time, so we advise everyone to take advantage of this opportunity to secure such valuable additions to his library.

Sacha Votichenko Revives Forgotten Art.

Sacha Votichenko, the eminent Russian musician, came to America in the early part of July, 1917, bringing with him the Royal Tympanon, one of the most unique instruments in existence. Indeed, to him, this tympanon is of priceless value, as it descends to him lineally from his famous ancestor, Pantaleon Hebenstreit, who near the end of the seventeenth century was one of the greatest musicians of his time.

King Louis XIV. presented Hebenstreit with this large gold tympanon as a wedding present, thus it holds cherished memories.

It is difficult to describe the fascination of this wonderful instrument. When Sacha Votichenko stands before it in the dim light of his beautiful New York studio, in the Hotel Des Artistes, he appears to be a spirit of ancient times. He believes that the tympanon can be heard to the best advantage in a small theatre or studio. All of his concerts, therefore, are of a personal and spontaneous kind, in which the hearers are almost as important as the performer and the conventional gulf between the stage and the auditorium is bridged by community interest and effort.

Of late, Mr. Votichenko's compositions all show the marked influence of the World War. They have the pathetic appeal which it is impossible to describe. Of his playing one may truthfully say, that seldom is it possible to hear anything more beautiful, more mystical, or more comprehensive of all the perfections of vocal and instrumental technique.

It is the human element that stands forth most prominently in this artist's work. His methods, therefore, are worthy of careful and analytical study. There is not a singer or player of ordinary instruments who may not learn much from him.

Rivoli Presents Perfect Performance.

Hats off to S. L. Rothapfel. He has called us "finicky." We accept the appellation. We expect a high standard of music from his theatre orchestras, but it is a pleasant surprise to be offered a perfect performance. Again we say, "Hats off to S. L. Rothapfel."

Erno Rapee conducted the "Southern Rhapsody Overture" opening the show of September 8. He excelled himself in the difficult interpretation of this quaint number. The orchestra put into it everything they possessed in the way of music, and never have we heard them to better advantage. The audience thought so too.

"Carmen Overture" was used for the educational film, "A Modern Mexican Hacienda." It fitted every inch of it, especially the bull fight. And—there was perfect synchrony.

"Temple Bells," an oriental song from the Indian Love Lyrics," by Woodforde-Finden, was well sung by Riccardo Bonelli, a baritone.

Seated upon oriental rugs with the incense pots dreamily smoking, cigarette between his lips, he languidly began the first verse. Beyond him the Sahara sky glowed in stars, the azure blue setting off in relief the red of Persian tapestry. Gradually his ennui disappeared as he became more earnest in his song. Throwing away his cigarette, he plunged into the third verse and brought the large audience to its feet by his mighty finale. It was a real touch of the Orient.

The Animated Pictorial received a fine setting, the chief number being "La Forza del Destina Overture." Here again was perfect synchrony.

The orchestral prelude to "He Comes Up Smiling" was a number called "Smiles." Every layman caught the significant connection by the titles and it made a strong appeal. The picture was lightly fitted, but held a dignity in keeping with the policy of the Rivoli. We congratulate "Roxy." He can play a comedy without the use of clap trap, cat calls and other cheap effects.

The organ solo closed the finest bill we have seen since "Blue Bird" was shown in the same theatre.

New Idea in Music Service Exchange.

Changes of industrial conditions always bring into existence new lines of business enterprise. Probably no new industry has had such a following of auxiliary companies in its wake, as the moving picture estate. We have seen the countless numbers of accessory firms spring up like mushrooms. New publishing houses for handling bills and posters have vied with the music publishers to catch some of the picture money. As the picture business has advanced so have these satellites prospered.

Music is now the great cry of the industry and the far seeing backers of the Music Service Exchange have caught the significance of the cry. Leaders situated in the large cities of New York, Boston, or Chicago, find little trouble in filling their musical needs, but those who guide the musical destinies of the small theatre in outlying districts find it almost impossible to procure a suitable library.

It is for the purpose of serving these unfortunate one, primarily, that the Music Service Exchange has been formed. This firm plans to sell to the leader any music he may need at no increase of price. It guarantees immediate shipment and speedy service. It will keep in close touch with the picture playing game, and if necessary, will select as well as buy if requested to do so. It will not publish any music nor ally itself with any publisher. It will always be a house of service in the strictest sense of the word.

Here is the chance for musicians and theatres to place themselves upon a standing order list that they may receive every new number as soon as it is placed on the market. There should be no excuse in the future for playing antiquated music, nor will the leader escape on the plea that his dealer cannot procure the music desired. Music Service Exchange will get it for you if it is in print.

We have investigated this company and find that it is all that it advertises to be. We extend to those connected with it our best wishes and feel free to say that they are a splendid acquisition to the moving picture industry in general and to the picture playing musician in particular.

Leaders' Service Bureau.

Questions Asked—Suggestions Offered.

Q. Can you tell me the name and address of the organization which looks after music for the camps? I have been told there is such an organization in New York which supplies sheet music of popular and marching songs for the cantonments at cheap rates. One of the drafted men from our office has written me as editor of the music column to find out the name of such an organization. He is at Camp Devens and says there is a woeful lack of music there. Any information you can give me on this subject will be appreciated.

A. It is understood that the "Raymond B. Fosdick Commission on Training Camp Activities" is collecting sheet music for distribution among the camps in the United States, but as this commission is located in Washington, D. C., there would have been more or less delay in communicating with it. Therefore, we telephoned directly to the following music publishers of New York, stating the need of Camp Devens. In every instance the answer was at once: "We will be pleased to send music." So the thanks of the "boys" at Ayer can be given to Shapiro, Bernstein & Co., 226 West Forty-seventh street; Joseph Stern, 102 West Thirty-eighth street; J. H. Remick & Co., 219 West Forty-sixth street; Leo Feist, 235 West Fortieth street, and M. Witmark & Sons, 144 West Thirty-seventh street.

The generosity of the musical profession generally is most gratifying to those connected with it. There has never been an appeal sent out for music, musical instruments or for singers and instrumentalists to take part in entertaining the soldiers at the camp, but what a ready and instant response has been received. It is hoped that Camp Devens soldiers will enjoy the contributions of music which they will shortly receive.

Q. I am a leader working in a picture house and supporting a family of three. I fall within the draft age. How does the law effect me?

A. You are working in what is considered an essential industry and you can claim exemption on that ground. The fact that you have a family wholly dependent upon you is a further reason for your exemption, and we believe that your local board will hardly expect you to go to the front.

Q. Our director is continually balling me out in front of the others and I feel that it is unjust. What can I do?

A. Get a new job or find out the real reason behind his actions and govern yourself accordingly.

Q. I receive much benefit from reading the Leaders' Service Bureau. Perhaps this question will not properly come under that head, but I am most anxious to know what becomes of the royalties on the German-owned Grand Operas in this country now that we are at war with that country. Can you tell me?

A. A great number of German-owned Grand Operas, Operettas, Plays, Songs and Books have been very successful in this country and have yielded splendid royalties. Only a few weeks ago, A. Mitchell Palmer, alien property custodian, took over the American rights to all such property which had been reported. The royalties in payment of these American rights are being collected and will be invested in Liberty Bonds.

Q. "I am preparing my next season's program and wish some songs which appeal to the public. I like 'The Women of the Homeland,' but it is a patriotic number. Is the public tiring of this kind of music? What would you advise.

A. No one is tired of patriotic songs. "The Women of the Homeland" is a good song, with a pronounced heart appeal. Mme. Schumann-Heink includes it regularly in her repertoire and this fact alone proves the worth of the composition.

Q. "Exactly what does libretto mean? Have operas always had librettos? Is an interesting libretto essential to an opera?"

A. Libretto is the diminutive of the Italian word, "libro," book, and means "little book." Time and use have modified that definition, however, for now the word libretto is, technically, "the book of the opera." In France, much interest centered around words of the opera and in French operas, the story is always interesting—with an appeal to the understanding of the audience. In light opera, it is essential that the words shall be understood, that the comedy may not be lost, but in grand opera, bad diction has been responsible for the fact that the public often listens to the music with no understanding of the plot of the opera. In the seventeenth century, Metastasio was a celebrated librettist. The "Father of French Opera," Abbe Perrin, with Cambert, produced the first French opera, "La Pastorale," which was first performed in 1659. Scribe, Barbieri, Meilhac and Halevy wrote the librettos of the nineteenth century. W. S. Gilbert, to whom Sir Arthur Sullivan was indebted for his librettos, is one of the most recent famous men. Planche was the author of Weber's "Oberon." Verdi was indebted to Boito for his "Otello and Falstaff." This will serve to give you a faint idea of the value of this form of composition.

HONOR ROLL

LAD O'ER THE SEA

By GERTRUDE WILSON

Published by Harold Flammer
New York

This plaintive little ballad is one of the best we have heard. Filled with sentiment, it has the true heart interest that will appeal to your patrons. Beautiful in melody, it makes an admirable theme. Get it.

Oscar Spirescu Passes Away Suddenly.

It was with deep regret that we learned the sad news of the passing of Oscar Spirescu, Symphony Director of the Strand Theatre, New York.

Mr. Spirescu had endeared himself to orchestra and patrons by his musicianly ability and kindly manner. Coming into the picture playing field after a wide experience in Grand Opera and Symphonic works, he rapidly forged to the front, quickly grasping the new elements that go to make pictures popular.

The Strand has sustained a distinct loss through his death and many thousands of his unknown friends will miss his genial presence. We extend to those bereaved our heartfelt sympathy, assuring them that Mr. Spirescu lived not in vain. His influence and character have stamped the industry indelibly.

Music for the Picture

Conducted by GEORGE W. BEYNON

Musical Directors Should Take Artistic Responsibilities Seriously

THE poor impression conveyed to the minds of the public in the early days of the "movies" by the mediocre ability displayed by picture players has been one of the greatest handicaps confronting the musical director of today. He finds it a difficult problem to maintain even a semblance of the dignity given to his profession in other branches. There is no unity of purpose among his brother musicians, nor can he look for help from the public.

Even yet, to those whose minds dislike analysis and deduction, the violinist playing pictures is one who plays only in first or second position, usually upon two strings. Artists in the singing field and those musical geniuses of instrumental music heard in concert consider it beneath their dignity to attend a motion picture theatre. Temperamentally averse to listening to a poor performance, they shun the place where they expect cheap music. They cannot conceive the idea of musical art allied to screencraft.

Sellers of instruments regard the efforts of picture orchestras as puerile and ineffectual because they seldom attend a theatre of this kind. They prefer the symphony concerts, grand opera and other concerts, where celebrated artists perform. The bad name still clings to the music offered with pictures, and they openly scoff at its artistic possibilities.

This striking condition plainly shows the first duty of the musical director fitting pictures. Whether he be an organist, pianist or orchestral leader, his responsibility is heavy. He must live down the bad name attached to his profession. He owes it to himself, to his employer, to his patrons and to music as an art that in accepting the position of musical director he gives the best possible results.

Time or clocks have no place in the life of a musical leader. He must enter into the duties to which the screen has called him with a whole-heartedness and evenness of purpose not to be deflected by side issues. The calling is indeed worthy of his artistic ability, but it requires more than simple artistry to raise this profession in the minds of the public. Industry and constant attention to details will help. Perfect picture portrayal will add to its laurels. Intensive interpretation of selections regarded as standing upon a higher plane than those usually attributed to this class of performance will prove that the concert halls do not hold a monopoly in classics. Let there be no let-down in the musical morale, and picture music must come to its own.

This eminently satisfactory result is not going to be attained without the surmounting of many obstacles. The first hurdle will likely be the manager. He is usually lacking in musical knowledge, and will wish to continue the playing of cheap music. He has become accustomed to the light, melodious and jingling stuff. His patrons have said they liked it, so why change? As an employe the orchestra leader will need much tact to place before his manager the strong arguments for better music. However, if the performance of light music be musicianly and always in good taste the step made into classics will not be a great one, and the change in quality of playing will be little noticed. Do not use "jazz" music in a feature or serious subject, but keep it for the comedies and the portrayal of slap-stick humor. When played it should be as well played as a nocturne. Put into it all the "pep" and "jazz" of which you are capable. Your manager will like it, and his resistance to good music will slowly vanish when he knows that his performance is not going to be turned into a "high-brow" symphony concert.

Organists who are called upon to play a church organ have been told to make their work sound like an orchestra. Managers have always held a fear that their theatre might be mistaken for a church and a puritan or two stroll in and refuse to contribute to the collection plate at the door. Organists have been notified that any "churchy" effect would automatically become the acceptance of their resignation. Theatres install an organ, the grandest of all instruments, and expect to hear a hurdy-gurdy or a caliope. Now there is only one way to play an organ, and after years of tedious and technical effort to learn it a theatre manager has no moral right to dictate a different method to which the organist must adhere. Organists must accept the responsibility of their position as a serious one and refuse to prostitute their art for the mere sake of monetary gain.

A pianist who has the charge of the music in a theatre should be careful in his improvisation. The masters have written wonderful numbers for the piano, which, when memorized, become gems in his repertoire, the rendition of which raises his art in picture playing. The key twiddling that emanates from his own brain can never be anything that will interest his audiences. This is not an aspersion cast against his musical ability, but rather a reflection upon the mental attitude of the public, who only enjoy those things that they have heard before. The duty of the pianist is to bring before the people the best in musical literature written for the piano; not indiscriminately, but well suited to the scenes depicted. There is abundant chance for improvisation in modulating from one key to the other during the change of music and scene. The comedy also holds opportunities for individuality. Let the pianist first consider his art. His personality should be secondary.

The responsibility of keeping up the high standard of music devolves also upon every orchestral player. He has no choice of what he may play, but he can at least show his virtuosity in that selected for him.

Many players leave their instruments in the theatre and never practice. Naturally their work suffers. It becomes indifferent and slovenly. It affects the orchestra generally and the result is poor music. Picture playing is as important as symphony work, and every musician should keep himself in trim. If the cornetist finds his top B slips on him he knows that he needs to improve his embouchure. Practice only will do it. If the clarinet player encounters difficulties in fingering of fast passages he owes it to himself to spend an hour each morning on finger exercises. Don't say to yourself, "Well, this is only a picture house. Why should I keep in shape?" The question is, Why should you not? You are paid for your work, and your best is expected. Because it looks like a steady position that is no guarantee that you will stay. Good work only will make it steady.

The picture industry has opened up a new field for musicians, for which they should be sincerely thankful. Their appreciation should be shown in the perfect performance of their work and the fulfillment of the heavy responsibility accepted by them to maintain the high standard and lofty ideals set by other branches of the musical profession. Every musical slacker helps to postpone the ultimate victory of good music for the pictures.

Popular War Song Chosen by B. S. Moss.

A contract has just been closed that should bring satisfaction to the two parties most intimately concerned and much pleasure to the public at large.

Charles K. Harris, the composer and music publisher, has signed over the picture rights of his popular Spanish-American war song, "Just Break the News to Mother," to B. S. Moss.

The song is to be made the nucleus of a seven-reel feature, upon which work will be begun as soon as possible.

Rialto Offers Exceptionally Fine Music.

The Rialto is well named the "Temple of the Motion Picture." There is never a program presented but what contains something of a startling nature and of true merit.

The overture last week was "Francesca Da Rimini," by Zandonia, with Dr. Reisenfeld conducting. It is a most intricate work and one seldom heard outside the large Symphony Concerts. Filled with counter themes it presents innumerable difficulties to orchestra and director, but Dr. Reisenfeld carried his men through it with apparent ease and enjoyment. The cello solo was especially well defined, the tonal balance being perfect. The difficult changes of tempi were well marked and contrasts from pp to ff magnificent. Music lovers can no longer complain that the works of masters are beyond their means.

The educational feature dealt with the life, habits and panorama of Mexico. The orchestra opened it with "Il Guarany" and we were apprehensive. Suddenly after the first strain they blended into a light Spanish intermezzo. Talk about musical art, this is the epitome of it. "Il Guarany" established the atmosphere of Mexican grandeur just enough to place the auditor in a receptive mood, then the picture was fitted scene by scene with other and lighter atmospheric music.

Tosti's "Good-bye," sung by Gladys Rice, was poorly orchestrated and gave no support to the singer, especially in the last ff passage. Many players had not parts and utilized the rest to carry on a little conversation among themselves. This is bad.

The surprise in the playing of the Pictorial Review lay in the playing pp during the scenes showing aeroplanes in operation. It has a psychological reason for its foundation that never struck us before, but it certainly is mighty effective.

Desere La Salle offered the baritone aria from "The King of Lahore," by Massenet. Mr. La Salle has a very fine presence, a splendid voice and knows how to get his songs "over." Joseph Klein wielded the baton for his accompaniment, and Joe has improved so much we could hardly believe it was he.

Mr. Klein's conducting is causing much favorable comment. His gestures are graceful, forceful and definite, his interpretations are sound musically, and withal he is at all times in full control of his men.

The big feature of the Rialto performances is the factor called Synchrony. There are no breaks in the music, no chopping of phrases, and yet each scene, whether found in the Weekly Scenic or Feature, is properly fitted and timed. Don't take our word for it, go and hear the music. It is worth while.

Anniversary of "Star-Spangled Banner."

The most patriotic demonstration New York has seen since the war began was celebrated at City Hall on Saturday, September 14, the one hundred and fourth anniversary of the "Star-Spangled Banner's" birth.

The Pelham Bay Naval Station Band played the "Star-Spangled Banner." Then Justice Pendleton, grandson of the author, related the history of the anthem and its relation to the past. Miss Anna Fitziu sang the song, and Miss Laurette Taylor recited Patrick Henry's immortal address. The crowd went wild with enthusiasm as she closed with the impressive lines: "As for me, give me liberty or give me death." Major General Bell referred to the anthem as the "Shibboleth of the greatest nation on earth," and spoke of the sacredness of our cause and our personal responsibilities in the present world crisis.

All through the ceremonies, as the music playing beneath the picture was heard, the newsboys chanting the victories of the American troops on the Western front. It seemed but a part of the remarkable scene thrown on the canvas of life.

"Battle Cry of Freedom" Answers Call.

At the outbreak of the Civil War an idea was prevalent in the North that it was only a matter of a few days before the slight blaze in the South should be snuffed out, and the few who had started it would be suing for forgiveness in the meekest of spirits. It seems never to have occurred to anyone that a conflagration had been started that could only be extinguished by rivers of blood.

Having this idea firmly fixed in the mind, President Lincoln's second call for troops came as a great shock to the nation, and consternation joined hands with patriotism. But there are always a few whose heads remain cool and whose hearts are loyal in any crisis. Among this number on the honor roll of the country the name of Dr. George Frederick Root shines out.

This gentleman came of stern New England stock. He was born in Sheffield, Mass., in 1820, when the aftermath of the war of 1812 was still being reaped by his people, and the influence of the period gave coloring to his life work. He received his musical training at Boston under George Webb. In 1844, he came to New York as organist of the "Church of the Strangers." But later he resigned this position and went abroad for a year's study in Paris. Returning, he settled in Chicago, and established the music publishing firm of Root & Cady.

Several cantatas and a large collection of school and church music are among his compositions. As a writer of war songs, he had the honor of presenting to the nation a group which breathed the spirit of the time and were a great aid in rousing the people to a sense of their duty and responsibility to their country. Among the best known at the present day are "Tramp! Tramp! Tramp!" "Just Before the Battle"—the pathos of which had such a depressing effect upon the soldiers that they were often ordered not to sing it—and "The Battle Cry of Freedom."

When Dr. Root heard that President Lincoln had asked for more volunteers to protect the Union, he realized the significance of the crisis and the need for an incentive to stir up patriotism. Under the inspiration of his own intense loyalty he wrote "The Battle Cry of Freedom" as a rallying factor. The next morning two young recruiting singers entered the music store for some patriotic music. Mr. Root showed them his new composition. They saw at once its possibilities, and sang it that day in the square. Before they had finished the crowd took up the refrain. It spread like wild fire over the country, and was heard everywhere. Often soldiers were ordered to sing it when going into battle, and so great was its appeal and influence that it is said to have turned the tide of one of the most decisive battles of the war. President Lincoln publicly referred to it, and stated that he considered the greatest service a song could render was to inspire a spiritual conception, or patriotism.

"If we had only possessed your songs you would not have beaten us," is a remark attributed to a Confederate veteran speaking to a Northern man after the war. Probably this is an exaggerated tribute to the power of song, but it emphasizes a fact. The war songs of the North had a swing and vim to them. They were no mean factors in adding recruits to the army and in keeping up the spirits of the people at home and the soldiers in the field.

The years have come and gone, blotting out the bitterness of the "sixties," but a few songs created to lighten the blackness of that decadé have survived. Among them we have the one composed by Mr. Root, which barely fell short of being the National song.

Again our armies are engaged in a mighty struggle, and, in this world-war for democracy, it seems peculiarly appropriate that we should sing with a new inspiration the "Battle Cry of Freedom."

Strand Synchrony Sincerely Suggested.

The Strand, of New York, has been until very recently the foremost exponent of good music for the pictures, and today it is offering musical presentations as good as ever. But the "as-good-as-ever" music has been improved upon, and no longer is it the forerunner of the best.

The performance of the week of September 15 is a case in point. The overture, "Peer Gynt Suite," by Greig, required no great effort to present properly, but its rendition was slovenly and poorly interpreted. The pictorial review was played in the same old "slappidy bang" style that has prevailed for some time. No attempt was made to synchronize this music, and the "breaks" were anything but pleasant.

Yon Collignon, a baritone, slurred through the "Benevute" song by Diaz, and then attempted "The Sunshine of Your Smile" (composer left off program) in English. His French is fair, and no doubt many thought the second song was sung in a foreign language, for his diction beggared description. Added to these few little faults he had the habit of leaving the key and roaming in pictures of sound totally foreign to the accompaniment.

"Johanna Enlists," a Pickford feature, was well fitted—by the organ principally. The same sudden and abrupt endings held sway during the orchestral accompaniment. Have they never heard of synchrony?

"Roce di Trivabera" (composer left off program) was sung in artistic style by Miss Grace Hoffman. She has a wonderful voice, and is a big favorite with Strand patrons.

During the scenic the music seemed to go a bit smoother, while the comedy cartoon was a splendid adaptation of light music.

The organ solo closed the bill.

"Hearts of the World" a Splendid Song.

It is remarkable how the whole world is drawn to the screen drama. Its importance is manifested in a thousand ways, and the one-time toy cinema has become the great motion picture—the fifth estate.

Music has always been more or less allied to the dramatic art, and has been especially adaptable to pictures. It has kept step with the rapid advancement in filmcraft, and bids fair to rise to a dignified profession on its own account.

Songs have been introduced as themes in picture scores since the "Birth of a Nation" with some success, but the Echo Publishing Company brought off an artistic and financial coup when they had "Hearts of the World," a beautiful ballad, interpolated into the score of the famous picture of the same name.

It shows the trend of the times when producers themselves encourage this advance in musical art. Mr. D. W. Griffith, after a careful analysis of the song, wired James W. Casey, the composer, as follows:

"Your song, 'Hearts of the World,' has my approval and endorsement. Hope that it will be a great success."

Miss Grace Nelson is singing the song in the performance at the 44th Street Theatre and winning unstinted applause. Already the song has sold beyond the hundred thousand mark, and looks like the popular hit of the year. No longer is the field of song limited to concert and recital halls, musical comedies and grand operas, oratorios and churches, the film claims its need of music and will not be denied.

Bricks cannot be made without straw nor can the bricklayer build his wall without a trowel. A large library of music is the straw for the leader's musical setting while the cue sheet is his trowel. The MOVING PICTURE WORLD gives you the trowel and the advertising columns show you where the straw stack is to be found.

Questions Asked—Suggestions Offered.

Q. There has been much discussion regarding the playing of "The Star Spangled Banner." How fast should it be played to gain the best results musically?

A. Our national anthem is usually played much too slow for singing purposes and if "dragged" becomes anything but inspiring. We would suggest that you play it about 104, which gives a brisk swing to the song that will take the popular fancy.

Q. How can I perfect myself in the playing of the clarinet?

A. We would suggest that you practice more assiduously. The clarinet is an instrument that requires constant playing to keep the player in good trim. The changing registers and difficult fingering makes it imperative that you keep up your scale exercises even if you have gone beyond the elementary stages of playing. There are some good books on the subject and it might be helpful if you procured these for study.

Q. I am a leader in a small place. I have a little orchestra composed of a piano, violin and organ. We cannot seem to keep our organists or violinists, because of the better offers they get else-from them he has given us a symphony worthy of much recognition.

Q. Having formerly held a very good job as a leader of a large orchestra in hotel work, how can I get into the picture game?

A. The playing of pictures is a profession that calls for a great deal of knowledge that the average player cannot get at first hand. We would suggest that you take a position as violinist or pianist, as the case may be, in an orchestra playing pictures. Watch the way the pictures are set and keep your eyes and ears open for pointers. There is the "Professional School for Picture Playing" in Los Angeles, Cal., where, no doubt, you would receive the training necessary, but it is the only one of its kind and the distance might be your handicap. Anything we can do for you personally we will be pleased to do.

Q. I am sick of playing the same old music all the time and I wish you would suggest where some new music can be obtained.

A. The easiest thing in the world, brother. Get an issue of the Moving Picture World, look in your department, called "Music for the Pictures," and there you will find many excellent firms advertising new music. If they are in this department, you can be sure that they are reliable and their offers bona fide. Recently Chappell and Company offered a bargain sale of twenty new orchestral numbers for two dollars.

Phonograph Co. Sees Vast Opportunity.

For the first time in the history of the phonograph business, the Columbia Graphophone Company are putting instrumental and vocal selections on the same record. The incentive for this change is "Mickey."

Mr. O. S. Benz, of the General Sales Department, makes the following statement relative to this innovation:

"As we have already made plans to record the vocal number of 'Mickey,' and in view of the enormous appeal the photoplay will have with the public in creating a desire to hear the music after seeing the picture, we have decided to place on the opposite side of the vocal number an instrumental number or medley of numbers taken from the 'Mickey' score, as written by Mr. Krouse. We will endeavor to select from it such music as can be used for an instrumental number."

In addition to this double-face record, the Columbia Company will release on September 20 a dance record of 'Mickey,' as played by the Earle Fuller Jazz Band.

It will, no doubt, also be of interest to the trade that the Aeolian Company are releasing their piano roll this coming month, and are putting out approximately one half million pieces of literature on this subject.

The Vocalian Company, the phonograph record branch of the Aeolian Company, has also in preparation a double face "Mickey" record to be released soon.

HONOR ROLL

Garden of Dreams

This song will prove a capital theme for sweet heroines, besides being adaptable for many love scenes. It should have a place in every leader's library.

where, which are more than our management can afford. What do you suggest?

A. It is an unwise thing to import players, and from what you have said we glean that the price is not very high. Now musicians are scarce owing to the draft. Why not pay your organist more money and do without the violinist? Piano and organ make a good combination. Duets can be arranged for overture purposes and all around good results obtained. Let the organ play the feature through and the piano the comedy. The balance of the program can be made interesting by alternating the two.

Q. Could you tell me who wrote the "New World Symphony," and under what conditions?

A. Anton Dvorak, the Bohemian composer, has added this wonderful work to the musical field, gaining considerable help from Harry Burleigh, the colored singer and composer. While not founded on actual Negro melodies—except a phrase from "Swing low, Sweet Chariot"—it is based on themes modelled after it. The peculiar and wierd harmonies of the darky are heard throughout it and then the principal theme of the final movements when repeated towards the end in a much quicker tempo, suggests "Yankee Doodle." Dr. Dvorak never tired of hearing the familiar plantation songs, and

Conducted by GEORGE W. BEYNON

The Dramatic Effect of Silence So Loud That It Is Audible

ALL I want is silence, and very little of that," said the Irishman, and in his humor there is some truth. We have other anxieties regarding "Silence that is golden," the "Wisdom of silence," and "Silence gives consent." Silence has played an important part in the diplomacy of nations, while the silent pause in music holds a wealth of meaning.

Silence in picture playing is beginning to be recognized as the strongest of dramatic effects. Used judiciously, it adds a punch to the picture that hitherto has been given with crashing chords. To emphasize the strong dramatic value of a screen action, we have had recourse to the cymbal, the big drum or the trumpeting in the orchestra. The slow crescendo ending in a double forte chord has hitherto typified the big moment.

But it was found that these means of accentuation were not always feasible. It required considerable deftness of timing and a close following of the picture to make the required synchronous effect. Moreover, if the orchestra reached the big chord before the climax had been reached in the picture, there was a semblance of burlesque that completely spoiled the picture. To attempt to retard the music in case the tempo had been too fast previously, would only take away the dramatic tension.

In melodramatic plays, it was found that the picture reached its climax when the villain was shot, and at the shot the music was abruptly broken off. A new number was started and the wise leader saw at once how much better it would sound if there was a well-defined pause after the shooting. In other words, the orchestra held its breath with the patrons until the suspense had passed. In this way, silence became a mighty dramatic factor in the presentation of pictures.

Analyzing the effects of silence, we find some very interesting facts. After the culmination of a valorous deed, when the audience has been held spellbound by the swift changing screen action leading up to it; silence relieves the nerve tension. On the other hand, after the well-beloved heroine has been run down by an automobile and we see her lying, bruised and dishevelled, upon the roadside, silence increases the mental strain. It is awesome and gives you that creepy sensation in the spine.

During the playing of the "Hearts of the World" at the 44th Street Theatre, in New York, the accompaniment became tacet every time the portrait of the Kaiser appeared. This form of silence might be called a portrayal of hate. It spoke volumes for the thoughts of the players and conveyed to the minds of the audience the fact that the hated Hun could not be interpreted musically. It has become the prevailing method of expressing disgust for Willful Wilhelm in the picture theatres throughout the country.

Strange as it may seem, silence expresses to a marked degree the antithesis of disgust-reverence. Some theatre orchestras allow a funeral scene in the pictorial to go musicless and the effect is splendid. After the hero has crossed the desert and dragged himself upon his hands and knees to the officer's camp, where he delivers the message that will save his sweetheart, his head falls forward and we know he has "fought the good fight." Silence is the most eloquent tribute to his bravery.

Another form of silence that meets with general commendation is that effected while a praying scene is shown. In "Enemy Aliens," during a scene showing the arrogant entrance of the enemy into the house of the heroine, a flash shows her child kneeling in prayer at the bedside. It lasts for fifteen seconds and the dramatic value of silence in this spot cannot be overestimated.

All flash backs may be handled in this way and obviate the continual difficulties encountered in selecting music for short extraneous situations. A scene that is totally foreign to the general situation being played cannot be fitted properly with a short number and a dacabo to the original theme. The break becomes so marked and the smoothness of the setting is lost. If the flash be in the atmosphere of the general scene, the music may continue pp, coming back to its natural volume when the flash has passed.

Scenes showing the thoughts of principals, enacted for the purpose of piecing together the screen story, may be portrayed by silence except where they run to any great length. Musically this illustrates the familiar saying "and in the meantime," great judgment must be used if these "reflection" scenes be silently treated, lest the audience may think that something has gone wrong with the orchestra.

Too much of a good thing is not a good thing at all, although we know that the silent pauses in a musical setting can be used to great advantage, it would be dangerous to use them continually. The less they are shown, the more effective they become when affected.

Let the musical director playing pictures seriously consider the many qualities of silence, for, in its judicial use, he has one of the strongest vehicles conveying dramatic values.

French Music Calls for Recognition.

Now that Germany has forever closed our doors to her music, we naturally must look about for a new source of atmospheric selections. Hunnish music must go and, although we have no desire to be as contemptible and brutal as our hated enemy, yet it is time we exercised a little common sense.

Why fatten the alien enemy's purse, flatter his vanity, advance his propaganda, and by tolerating German music, when we will not tolerate anything else from that source?

France, our two-time ally, offers to us her richest store of musical art. We have heard the French Military Band and French Orchestra render marvelous works, hitherto unknown. Thousands of masterpieces are awaiting rendition by American orchestras and the plaudits of American patrons. We owe it to ourselves to become more familiar with this school of music, numbering among its great composers such celebrities as Massenet, Bizet, Berlioz, Godard and Chaminade.

The recent visit paid to France by Walter Damrosch paved the way to a greater and better understanding. Mr. Damrosch, in speaking of the willing co-operation exhibited by the French musicians, recites the following anecdote:

"Let me give you one instance of how the French are co-operating with us. As you know I went over carrying with me a check from Harry Harkness Flagler, president of the New York Symphony Society, to defray the expense of securing an orchestra of fifty men and making with them, a tour of the American rest camps. It was found impossible to do this, as all available transportation facilities were needed in the prosecution of the war. It was decided, however, that I give a few concerts in Paris, and we began to get together the orchestra members.

"At the first rehearsal, forty-three men were present, and several of this number were members of crack regimental bands, whose official duties would not permit of their absence from their own organization on Sunday. I said to them: 'Now, men, we can't give a concert with forty-three men in the orchestra. Here, we in America, are giving you one, two, three millions of soldiers, if necessary, and you can't give me eighty men for an orchestra.' With one voice they said: 'But we will,' and at the next rehearsal I had seventy-seven players, some of them the finest musicians in France, who had volunteered in their eagerness to show their good will to America."

The true spirit of France is seen in this story. Every Frenchman wants to help and we should reciprocate his feeling, backing it up with action. We need French music and its acceptance will please France while it benefits us.

Rialto Orchestra Renders "Pucciniana."

The Rialto orchestra opened its program during the week of September 22 with the overture, "Pucciniana." This is a potpourri of melodies from Puccini's successful operas, "Manon Lescault," "La Boheme," "Tosca," "Madame Butterfly" and "The Girl of the Golden West." The latter had its premiere at the Metropolitan Opera House in 1910. It made a bigger hit as played by the Belasco Company, which toured the country, than it did at the Metropolitan. Possibly one reason may be that "Addio, mia California," does not sound like the language of the Western miners.

We felt that there was a distinct improvement in the brass section of the orchestra, whether it was due to the presence of Trumpeter Rubenstein or whether our seeing him in that part of the orchestra had its subconscious influence, we are unable to state. At any rate, the usual brassiness had disappeared in mellowness. The finale was somewhat spoilt by the seeming inability of the drummer to get his tympani in tune.

"Through the Fjords of Norway" received a characteristic Norwegian setting, and proved very pleasing.

Sascha Fidelman, the blond-haired concert-master, rendered the "Polonaise," by Vieuxtemps, in a manner startling in its simplicity. Mr. Fidelman has a style all his own, conveying to his auditors a sense of ease and tranquility. He is extremely popular with the patrons of the Rialto.

During the playing of the "Animated Magazine" there were two scenes that stood out. For the scene showing the funeral of Cardinal Farley the organist camouflaged the old Irish song, "Mavourneen." This, to our way of thinking, was inexcusable. Why will musicians continually accept it for granted that the average audience is not sufficiently conversant with the intricacies of music to see through a harmonious veneer and fail to distinguish its melody? The use of an Irish folk-song for the funeral of a dignitary of the church savored strongly of travesty. The other predominant feature of the review was the excellent rendition of the long-meter Doxology for the silent prayer of the populace of a Western city. It was magnificently done in a spirit of reverence which strongly impressed the audience.

Usually, in reviewing a new soloist who has all the ear-marks of a professional singer, but whose first performance is somewhat ragged, we refrain from any comment. But the singing by Eldora Stanford of "The Star" was disgracefully inadequate in every sense of the word. Amateurish in her stage presence, throaty in production and continually slurring her notes, she gargled and garbled the words in a key frequently foreign to the song. Inquiry has elicited the fact that her earlier experience has been along the lines of light opera and very little of that. Why spoil the wonderful reputation of the Rialto for high standards of vocal art by allowing such a public affliction.

Rivoli Offers Splendid Musical Bill.

The music at the Rivoli becomes better all the time; in fact it has resolved itself into the outstanding feature at this theatre.

During the week beginning September 22, "Marche Slave," by Tschaiowsky, opened the program. This Slavic march is based on two themes—a Serbian folk-song, "Come, My Dearest, Why So Sad?" and the former Russian National Hymn. It was composed in 1876, and first played in Moscow. It was well directed by Erno Rapee, although the finale suffered a bit through haste. Mr. Rapee seems especially at home in the interpreting of Slavonic music, and his command of his men is growing stronger.

The educational film depicting "Picturesque Industries of Mexico" received a fine setting of Spanish music, distinctly atmospheric.

Then followed the Rialto male quartette singing (a) Sandman, (b) Drum a capello. In our years of experience we have heard numerous male quartettes, and had the honor of directing a few good ones, but we can honestly say that we have never heard such excellent unaccompanied singing by any other four. The voices blend beautifully, their enunciation is clear, phrasing together, and the general ensemble perfect. Frequently we have paid two dollars to hear celebrated artists perform worse in recital work. Mr. Rothappel is to be congratulated upon securing such a highly artistic offering for the Rivoli.

The animated pictorial, as usual, was admirably adapted musically. Opening with "Il Guarany," the orchestra went into a potpourri of old and well-known sea songs, such as "Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep," "Larboard Watch" and "La Mariner." It is the proper use of these ancient melodies that makes the Rothappel performances stand in a class of their own.

Leeta Corder, a soprano, sang "China Dream," beautifully set by John Wenger. Her stage setting was distinctly Oriental, and we had a glimpse of China as it is today.

The feature, "Laughing Bill Hyde," although somewhat uninteresting in itself, was well fitted musically.

Following this we heard the selection from the "Pink Lady" and watched the comedy, both well played by the orchestra.

A Courteous Comment from Carl.
STRAND THEATRE of New York
September 24, 1918.

My dear Mr. Beynon:
Allow me to congratulate you upon the efficiency of your department, "Music for the Picture." It interests me mightily, and I conscientiously read every word of it.

I sincerely appreciate your frank candor and unbiased criticism. They are all for the uplift of music in the picture theatres and the establishment of this new profession on a sound basis. Every musician should feel grateful for the help to be obtained from your unstinted efforts.

Nothing could give me greater pleasure than to assist in the good work.

Yours very sincerely,
Carl Edouarde.

The entire program of music was perfectly synchronized, presented smoothly and in good taste.

Sherman and "Marching Through Georgia"

"Sherman's dashing Yankee boys will never reach the coast!" So the saucy rebels said, and 'twas a handsome boast."

Thus the fourth verse reads. Was it the personal reference that displeased General Sherman or did the tune really annoy him, as he always insisted. Whatever the cause, the illustrious gentleman professed great antipathy to "Marching Through Georgia," and showed much annoyance whenever he heard it. He is authority for this little story regarding it:

While he was traveling abroad, he was in his room one night getting ready to retire. Suddenly he heard a band playing the hated tune. Although he resented being pursued into a foreign land by the one piece of music he could not endure, he hastily got into his uniform and went out on the balcony, thinking he was to be welcomed into the city with a serenade. To his great surprise, the band marched right past his hotel with never an upward glance. Later he found out that the air was then, and still is, very popular abroad.

There is no special story connected with either the music or the lyrics. Aside from its genuine merit as a war song, the most interesting fact in connection with it is the peculiar idiosyncrasy of a great man which caused him to detest it.

The author and composer, like Dr. Root, was a New Englander, having been born in Middletown, Connecticut, in 1832. Henry Clay Work was not favored with the opportunity for study afforded to most composers, and was absolutely self-taught as far as his compositions were concerned. His first success was "We Are Coming, Sister Mary," but "Grandfather's Chair" and "Shadows on the Floor" are equally well known. Among the war songs he composed between the years of 1861 and '65 are "God Save the Nation," "Drafted Into the Army," "Song of a Thousand Years" and "Marching Through Georgia." The last named is the only one of them that seems inclined to remain in the minds of the people. It commends itself to the remnescent mood of the veteran soldier, and is always heard at the reunions of the Grand Army of the Republic.

On Memorial Days, when we watch the remnant of that splendid body of men to whom we owe so much, and see them march falteringly down the street to pay their tribute to their comrades who have passed on, our hearts go out to them in loving sympathy. But we always feel a flow of warmth and comfort as the drooping shoulders straighten and the dragging steps quicken when the band breaks into march time wafting the years away with the strains of "Marching Through Georgia." A miracle is performed before our eyes! The memory of the long ago rejuvenates the men in uniform, and they become again the "Boys in Blue" if only for a day.

Hadley Announces Cinema Song Cycle.

Hopp Hadley, who has been making a special study of combining the charms of music and pictures for several years, now announces another innovation which promises to attract considerable attention in musical and picture circles. His first production along musical lines completed last spring was the five-reel drama, "The Lost Chord," especially arranged to feature the theatre orchestra, pianist or organist by the introduction of scenes illustrating the symphony played by the musicians. He called "The Lost Chord" a cinema-symphony, and it is now being distributed through the Four Square Exchange.

Mr. Hadley's new effort combines several high class baritone solos with a picture telling a complete story; the picture so closely allied to the songs that the words of the soloist appear on the screen as the subtitles of the drama. He calls this production a cinema-song-cycle, as it tells the story of the world-famous song-cycle, "Eliland," the beautiful songs of which are found on concert programs everywhere.

"The title of the first cinema-song-cycle is 'The Vow,'" said Mr. Hadley. "The negative is now being cut, and I hope to give a private showing in about a week. The song-cycle 'Eliland,' which it illustrates, is too well known to need any introduction. The picture is practicable from the theatre standpoint in every way, although, of course it is only suitable for first-class houses. I had the pleasure of showing it to David Bispham, William G. Stewart and several other prominent artists recently. The noted baritone, Raymond Ellis, will sing the solos for its initial presentation. I think that the picture is worthy of the beautiful music which is really a part of it. Herbert Carlton is responsible for the camera work, which is as fine as any I ever saw. It runs just thirty minutes, and will be offered as a novelty for theatres featuring their music and also for use as a concert number. I believe it will mark the introduction of motion pictures into the concert world."

Ticket-tax agitation will ultimately compel landlords to pay space-rates for flat-windows overlooking airdomes.

Questions Asked—Suggestions Offered.

Q. Would it be possible for you to print a cue sheet for the serial, "Hands Up," in your columns, "Music for the Picture?" This would be greatly appreciated.

A. As you have noticed, all our cue sheets are classified and arranged in uniform style. Unfortunately, all those issued by the producer are not adaptable for rearrangement unless we alter the subject of the suggestions, which would be unfair to the arranger. However, we have spoken to the producers, and hope that all their cue sheets will soon appear in our department. If there is any assistance which we can offer personally, we will be glad to do so.

Q. I find in the cue sheet for "The Hun Within" four typically German numbers, as follows: "Lorelei," an old German folk-song; the American light opera drinking song, "Old Heidelberg"; the notorious "Wacht am Rhein," and Beethoven's "Egmont." While charmed with the beauty and technique of the play, the production was somewhat spoiled for me by the introduction of these German numbers, although one of them was purposefully omitted by the orchestra leader. It seems to me that, while the picture scenes are necessary to the action of the plot in the delineation of German character, the introduction of incidental German cue music is an offence to the ear that might easily be dispensed with, and good old U. S. A. music substituted. What do you think?

A. We are not responsible for the suggestions as embodied in "The Hun Within," as we have no authority to change any of the subject matter found in the cue sheets as presented to us for publication. However, we have seen the picture, and agree with you in your protest. In this particular instance, other selections are possible, and the ones used, although atmospheric, are not absolutely essential. You will note in our columns an article expressing our views of music from German origin.

Q. Will you kindly tell me in your Leader's Service Bureau where I can obtain the song recently published which begins, "Dear land of the free, the land of our birth?"

A. The patriotic song you mention is entitled "When the Bugle Calls for Old Glory." The words are by Walter S. Griffith, and the music by Everett J. Evans. You will be able to procure the music by addressing Mr. Griffith at the Riant Studio, 90 Rogers avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Praises Mutual's Musical Settings.

The Mutual has received many complimentary letters of appreciation on the musical settings made for its productions which are printed on each press-sheet issued. These settings are compiled by Joseph O'Sullivan, Director of Music Service for Mutual, who has incorporated several interesting and helpful suggestions in his cue-sheets.

Max Adamsky, musical director of the Gold Theatre, Chicago, which ran "Love's Law," the first Gall Kane Production, released by Mutual, for two nights, is enthusiastic in his praise of Mutual's musical settings. Mr. Adamsky was soloist of the Chicago Grand Opera Co. for several seasons, and has played with the foremost symphony orchestras in America and Europe.

In a letter to Mutual, Mr. Adamsky says:

"I wish to say that it gave me great pleasure to synchronize the music cues compiled by you for 'Love's Law' which was shown at the Gold Theatre for two nights. The music was of a classic nature, well selected, and fitted the picture perfectly.

"Kindly send me, as soon as possible, cue-sheets on 'A Hoosier Romance' and 'His Birthright,' which are booked at the Gold. Also, send me orchestration of 'Nipponese,' the theme which you wrote for 'His Birthright.'"

The musical setting made for "His Birthright," the first Hawthorth Production starring the great Japanese actor, Sessue Hayakawa, contains a theme written by Mr. O'Sullivan "Nipponese," which is printed on an insert sent out with each pressbook of "His Birthright." This is distinctly Japanese in character, being based on fragments of old Japanese themes, an Old Samura Prayer and a Love-Lay supposed to have been indited by a Mikado of the seventh century furnishing material for this theme. It should prove a splendid aid in interpreting the character of action in "His Birthright."

Classified Cue Sheets Receive Praise.

During an itinerary of the Eastern states recently one of the representatives of the Moving Picture World received many favorable comments about our classified cue sheets. Exhibitors and musical directors were enthusiastic over the service rendered through the music department. It is the first time in the history of the industry that a trade journal has attempted to purvey a uniform music service, practical from every standpoint and easily read by the leader.

There were some who complained about the unsuitability of a few of the musical suggestions, but this is really a matter of personal opinion, and we have no authority to change any of the subject matter submitted to us by the producer. Others were loud in praise of the ease with which the classified cue sheets could be filed for future reference.

All this is most gratifying. Our department is for the leader. We wish to join hands with that of the producer that he may receive quick and reliable service, and every exhibitor should see that his leader gets our department, "Music for the Picture."

Music for the Picture

Conducted by GEORGE W. BEYNON

The Art of Picture Presentation Cannot Afford the Abuse of Silence or Semi-Silence

SINCE we have dwelt extensively upon the subject of the use of silence in picture playing, it seems only right that the abuse of silence receives some consideration.

Frequent silent moments in the changing from one number to the other detracts from the picture and creates a sense of piece-meal artistry that is both distasteful and displeasing to picture patrons. No matter how quietly you may finish a selection, no perceptible delay should occur before proceeding with the next number. A silence at this point will break the smoothness of accompaniment and divert attention from the feature.

Should the music finish in arpeggio style, with closing chords separated by rest signs, it is quite permissible to lengthen the duration of the rests until they become moments of silence. The chords must of necessity be six-fours, dominant sevenths, or repeated tonics, and, as the first two classes need resolution, the ear will hold the tone with expectation for what is to follow. This is done subconsciously and will detract in no way from the scene depicted upon the screen. The repetition of the tonic chords after pause rests must be done with a change of volume, either crescendo or diminuendo to make the finale effective, and immediately upon the completion of the last chord, the new number should begin.

All good speech makers understand the value of the rhetorical pause which usually signifies expectancy of a denouement or gives time for the auditors to absorb and digest the last emphatic statement. This silence can only be effective when the speaker chooses the proper psychological moment to continue his address. If he delay too long, the entire speech will "fall," and he will lose the attention of his listeners.

Music for the pictures may be emphasized and enhanced materially by the use of a rhetorical pause. The sad music slowly dies away as the scene, showing the unhappy heroine, slowly fades out. Behold! the next scene depicts the vile and violent villain hurriedly groping his way out of the darkness of a tunnel. Barely discernible in the distant and dim light is the sputtering fuse that will blow up the mine, endangering the lives of many toilers deep in a new shaft. The scene opens silently, as far as the music is concerned, while the villain hastily runs away. The sputtering fuse is shown again now, almost reaching the powder cap. Every eye is strained, every heart beats faster, every nerve is tense with expectancy.

Bang! the explosion occurs, tearing up the earth, and hurling debris. At the same instant, the music with a crash of cymbal and double forte chord, reinforces the dramatic episode.

This silence might be called the rhetorical pause of expectancy. It promises something big to follow, and makes more emphatic the explosion by its sudden volume, perfectly synchronized with the screen action. To prolong the silence until after the explosion would be suicidal, and would make the dramatic value of the scene farcical. Nevertheless, it has been done and will be done again, so long as musicians refuse to sleep in bed and take their naps in the orchestra pit.

Some orchestras still persist in allowing the opening title and introduction

Manager Robertson Likes Our Efforts.

My Dear Mr. Beynon:

Just a word to say I look for your musical column in the "Moving Picture World," as I do for my breakfast after my bath in the morning.

It is a great help and, believe me, I am benefiting by it.

Yours truly,

of the principal roles to be screened in silence. Their argument is to the effect that they must begin when the first scene is shown. They think they are fitting scenes, when they should be setting the picture in part and as a whole. The audience believes the leader is unprepared and the accusation is somewhat accurate and well founded.

This preliminary silence is not only an abuse of a dramatic factor, but the loss of a great opportunity for truly effective music. This spot should always be utilized to play a number that embodies the dominant emotion of the play, or to firmly establish the atmosphere of what is to follow. If a feature is worthy of a setting, it surely merits ushering in; if fit for presentation, it calls for a proper introduction.

While treating with the abuses of silence, let us note the misuse of what, for a better name, we call semi-silence—those interludes where one instrument plays a few bars alone.

During the running of "The Hypocrites," a few years ago, the orchestra played "Il Guarany" to accompany a scene of riot, where a priest was stoned to death by the mob. Just at the height of the turmoil, when they were about to pounce upon their victim, the clarinet plaintively performed a cadenza. This was too much for the taut nerves of the assembled people and a roar of laughter spoiled the balance of the otherwise good program. It also spoiled the evening for the orchestra and especially for the careless conductor.

Cadenzas must be used sparingly in picture playing for they create a noticeable absence of sound that must be in keeping with the spirit of the scene to be permissible.

Small orchestras in suburban or small-town theatres are usually very painstaking in their musical program to an extent that sometimes gets them into difficulties. Desiring to obviate unpleasant harmonic changes of key, they allow their pianist to throw in a few chords of modulation as a solo between numbers. If a leader could only sit "out front" and hear those modulations every few minutes until his ears ached with the monotony of it, until he found himself listening in dread for the next one, he would never perpetrate such an abuse of semi-silence again. Choose the lesser of two evils if need be, but leave the pianistic thump-thumps out of your setting.

The semi-silence of trumpet calls must be used only after careful thought. A cornet suddenly breaking into brassy exclamation is not the most pleasing sensation at best and, if at every opportunity, the approach of our soldier boys is heralded by a blating bugle, it becomes tiresome, shoddy, cheap, and good ground for changing one's patronage.

There is another form of semi-silence that, when used occasionally and under the proper conditions, becomes most effective. Recently, while enjoying a bill offered at the Rialto Theatre, New York, the writer was shown a scenic dealing with "Tales from the Tall Timbers." It was educational in its mission and delineated the history of the tree from stump to saw mill. At a point where the log began to slide down the mountain side via a special chute, the orchestra stopped playing. Nothing was heard but a low rumbling of the timpani. This increased in speed and volume as the log rushed faster and faster toward the base of the mountain, and, as it plunged into the lake below, the mighty roaring suddenly ceased with the crash of cymbals, and the swish of sand blocks.

This form of semi-silence can only be used when the element of surprise is needed. Continual recourse to it would naturally bring it down to the level of all clap trap effects and ruin its usefulness as a dramatic factor or unexpected innovation.

How an Animated Song Sheet Boosted the Fourth Liberty Loan

Animated Song Sheet of Broadway Strand Theatre, Detroit.

There Were Sixty Girl Singers, One for Each Note. The Drop Measured Twenty-four by Thirty-four Feet.

FEW cities in the country are doing as much, none more, than Detroit, Michigan, to show their patriotism in a practical manner.

Detroit has many theatres successfully conducting community singing and was one of the first cities, if not the first, to start a movement of giving free theatre tickets to soldiers and sailors in uniform.

But the week of September 22 marked a radical and charming departure from the usual music program at the picture houses. It was inaugurated at the Broadway-Strand Theatre and was planned to start off the Fourth Liberty Loan selling campaign. It was called an "Animated Song Sheet" and consisted of a drop curtain twenty-four by thirty-four feet in size. On it was printed a reproduction of the chorus from the patriotic song, "For Your Boy and My Boy." Eddie McGrath sang the first verse and chorus. When he came to the second chorus, the drop was exposed. Through the round black part of each note was a girl's head—there were sixty of them—and they joined Mr. McGrath in the chorus. Naturally at each performance, this innovation elicited such tremendous applause that the encores were practically limitless.

The animated song sheet is not exactly a new idea, as it has been presented in vaudeville and with the big shows, but it is probably the first time it has been carried out on such an elaborate scale at any motion picture house.

The total expense, including salaries to the singers, came to nearly twenty-five hundred dollars. But the Broadway-Strand Theatre considers the outlay well spent to boost the Fourth Liberty Loan through its official songs.

"There Is No Hyphen in My Heart."

In 1916, a poem, under the above caption and written by Mrs. Josephine M. Fabricant, appeared in the New York Herald and The Globe. It was reprinted in the newspapers all over the country.

The poem took New York by storm and was read before over two thousand teachers during Liberty Week. Mrs. Fabricant recited it for six thousand people at the College of the City of New York, recently.

She has in her possession letters from many prominent people praising the poem. Colonel Roosevelt acknowledged it and wrote "That is the real American doctrine."

It was published in July, 1918, by Lockhardt & Belder, being set to music by Mrs. Adriane Holmes Edwards, composer of the famous "God Bless You, My Dear." This latter song, Guiseppa de Lucca, the Metropolitan baritone, is using on his programs.

"There is No Hyphen in My Heart" has been sung very successfully at the camps by Raymond Ellis, the baritone of the London Opera Company. It is being sung at the patriotic gatherings for the Fourth Liberty Loan.

Audubon Picture Presentation Pleases.

It was Sunday evening at the Audubon Theatre at 165th street and Broadway, New York City. The feature for that last portion of the week was "Why America Will Win," being the life story of General Pershing filmatized. The orchestra consisted of twelve men and an organist, all fair material individually, the ensemble of which was splendid.

After a rather strenuous gastronomical exercise at the trenchant board, we repaired thither for lighter diversion of the mind. Mr. Fox surely knew we were coming and must have guessed our condition, for the soothing atmosphere of the Audubon settled upon us, and lo! we were content.

The feature had just commenced and the organist softly portrayed the picture musically. No clap-trap bells nor tin whistles annoyed us; no pomposity of tone marred the serenity of the occasion. Later, the orchestra took up the work and continued quietly but thoroughly to accompany the swift changing scenes. Beautifully balanced in tonal quality, always subdued, in volume well under the picture, it played music which fitted every foot of the picture as though a part of it. We were pleased.

Here, in a semi-vaudeville theatre, we found the true art of picture presentation flourishing like the green bay tree. Here we found perfect synchrony, perfect suitability, and perfect interpretation. 'Tis well, for this is an abundance of proof that fitting features must receive careful consideration, tedious thought and be well directed, to draw capacity houses in these days of fine filmcraft.

"Maryland" a Challenge for Secession.

When we are becoming intimately acquainted with the patriotic songs of America, we must not neglect the one poem which is of the South, for the South and by the South in a peculiar sense which isolates it from all others and leaves it standing on an eminence quite by itself.

When the great struggle between the North and the South had reached the crisis where the dissatisfied states were declaring their independence and, one by one, had begun to secede from the Union, James Ryder Randall, a native of Baltimore, was a young man twenty-two years old. Being engaged in newspaper work in Louisiana, at the outbreak of the Civil War, he had an opportunity to follow the course of events, and his heart was, naturally, with his mother state. In April, 1861, he read the grim statement that Northern troops had been fired upon while passing through Baltimore.

Mr. Randall had been greatly distressed and chagrined because Maryland did not cast in her fortunes with the new forming confederacy. But now he felt assured of her loyalty to the South and this unexpected act of rebellion seemed indicative of the future stand. The inspiration of this hope fired his imagination. It was midnight, but he responded to his emotions and, at a single sitting, produced what is, next to the "Battle Hymn of the Republic," the finest poem of the Civil War. Mr. Randall made the application more direct by its simple title "Maryland," and the lyrics had an appeal that was irresistible. The poem was published in the New Orleans "Delta" and attracted immediate attention.

It was first introduced as a war-song by Miss Jane Cary, a popular society girl of Baltimore, who sang it as her contribution to the festivities at a serenade given her by a division of Beauregard's army. She also had the honor of selecting the music for it, using the old German folk melody, "O Tannenbaum." This was an original Westphalian Folk Song, which assumed its present form in 1819, being adapted by August Zarnack, to whom we are indebted for the change from 4/4 to 3/4 time. Longfellow made a free translation of the lyrics of the song and called his poem, "O Hemlock Tree."

"Maryland," like many other songs born at the same period, has had its sectional appeal swallowed up in a national appreciation. In our time, there is as much enthusiasm evinced at the playing of "Maryland" before a New York audience as could be possible for one in Baltimore over this song, the "Marseillaise of the Confederacy."

"American Music Optimists" Greet Us.

Musical artists and composers of America, who have grown somewhat pessimistic over the future of their art, will be glad to know that there is a flourishing society in New York City which was organized and lives to further the interests of deserving American musicians.

The society is called "The American Music Optimists." Miss Mana Zucca, of 4 West 130th street, New York City, is the "fairy godmother" of the enterprise, and this gifted young composer ideally acts the part for which she has cast herself. She is an idealist and a firm believer in finding and helping the talented person who cannot just find himself.

With this end in view, compositions, either in manuscript or published form, can be submitted to the judges of the society. They will pass upon them. Those accepted will be presented at the concerts given at stated intervals. It is not necessary to be a member of the society to obtain a hearing, nor is any expense attached to these performances, as far as the composer is concerned.

The society has the indorsement of many people of prominence in the musical world, including Enrico Caruso, Gatticasazza, Daniel Frohman and Oscar Saenger.

The Fourth Liberty Loan is on, boys, and the opportunity has arrived to show the patriotic and thrifty citizenry of the picture player. Don't let it be said that the musician shirked his duty. Don't let it be said that he made no attempt to aid in the great fight for Democracy. Now is the time to show that we have a real live profession that interests itself in the civic life of the community and the state. Obscurity should not be our portion nor will it be, if the musician playing pictures grasps this opportunity—it really is a privilege—to buy bonds to his utmost and sees that his fellow players do likewise.

The FOTOPLAYER

performs patriotically by releasing musicians needed in war service

The FOTOPLAYER furnishes the necessary musical appeal in a real human way. The reed and string tones are faithfully reproduced—the drums and traps complete a full orchestral equipment.

The FOTOPLAYER may be played manually or by roll. The double tracker device permits the operation of two rolls—optional in tune and tempo—to fit the mood and action on the screen.

The FOTOPLAYER is built simple and strong, lowers the "up-keep" of the Pit and banishes the worries of an orchestra.

Hundreds of enterprising exhibitors are convinced that the FOTOPLAYER is a successful substitute for an orchestra.

LEADER'S SERVICE BUREAU.

Suggestions Offered. Questions Answered.

Q. WILL you kindly tell me through the Leader's Service Bureau the name of the national song of Italy?

A.—The official national air of Italy is the "Marcia Reale," but the "Garibaldi Hymn" is the most popular and universally used song of that country.

Q.—I am looking for a new supply of music for the piano. Would it be possible for you to notify some of the music publishers to send me catalogues that I may select what I need?

A.—You will find in the advertisements run in the department "Music for the Pictures" of the Moving Picture World, a considerable number of publishers who would be glad to hear from you. We suggest that you write to the Music Service Exchange, 507 Fifth avenue, New York City, as they seem to be especially fitted for supplying a library of all classes of music, from all publishers. Anything we can do to help you, rest assured will be done.

Q.—Who is the author of the now very popular song, "Keep the Home Fires Burning?" Can you tell me any thing about its origin?

A.—The writer of the lyrics of "Keep the Home Fires Burning," Mrs. Lena Guilbert Ford, was killed in a German aeroplane raid on London in March, 1918. Ivor Novello was the composer of the music for Mrs. Ford's words. He tells the story of the birth of the song in this way: "I do not know what inspired me, but I had in mind the keeping of as many homes as possible happy during the absence of the soldiers. The phrase, 'Keep the home fires burning' kept running in my mind. I called up Mrs. Ford, whom I knew for a good writer of lyrics, and talked with her about it. She came in and wrote the words in ten minutes. I did the music in about the same time and the whole thing was fixed up in about half an hour." That is the history of a song that sells millions of copies.

Q.—Can you tell me anything about Jan Sibellus. We read that he had perished by order of the Red Guards?

A.—We infer by your question that you mean the Finnish composer, Jan Sibellus. As a matter of fact, he was sentenced to death by the Red Guards a short time ago. But he escaped, and after hiding for days in a cellar, eventually reached Stockholm, where he now is. It seems that to save the life of Sibellus, a friend of his had to appeal to the war minister of Finland. This man was a liberated felon and a one-time cornet player. He knew the Sibellus compositions and favored them, hence his kindly offices were not difficult to get.

"The Legend"—A Grand Opera by Brell.

Who was that musical scoffer who loudly told us we had no musician in the picture industry? Have him paged that he may hear the glad tidings that brings refutation to his calumnies.

Signor Gatti of the Metropolitan Opera Company has announced, among the great operas to be presented during the coming season, one called "The Legend," composed by our old friend, Joseph C. Brell, of the "Birth of the Nation" fame. He also wrote the music for "Intolerance" and a series of exceptional photoplay hurries published by Chappell & Co.

With evident satisfaction, Signor Gatti says: "Mr. Brell's opera is entitled 'The Legend,' book by Jacques Byrne. It is a dramatic episode, the locale of which is a remote district in an imaginary Muscovite country. The author, I understand, has written a number of moving picture scenarios. Mr. Brell is the composer of several successful popular songs and has learned his technique as an operatic composer by writing incidental music for big cinema productions."

We congratulate Mr. Brell and wish him a wonderful success in his new musical field. We shall certainly be on hand to hear the opera and hope that the afore-said scoffer sits in the adjacent seat.

The American Flag.

By Mayor L. C. Hodgson.

It is no fabric of silk or bunting—no mere beautiful cloth woven by human hands. It is a living thing, pulsing with the throbbing ardors of humanity, glowing with the fervor of immortal hopes, leaping out in ecstasies of love and dream. It is a song—the song of upward looking men. It is an altar fragrant with sacrifice. It is a garden wherefrom a nation grew, watered by the pure blood of heroes. It is a Heaven wherein the sanctified are gathered. It is the home where freemen dwell. It is the battlefield whereon honor strikes its blow for the cause of God. It is a flame springing up to consume injustice and wither the hosts of wrong. It is a voice that speaks with the eloquence of graves where sleep those who died to make it mean purity and righteousness. He who looks upon that flag with ransomed eyes beholds within its fold the valor and the faith of Lexington and Gettysburg—the blazing eyes of the embattled farmers at Concord Bridge—the fierce splendors of the ocean that was the cradle of Paul Jones—the clarion death cry above the ruined Alamo—the prayer of Washington at Valley Forge—the agony of Lincoln as he paced the midnight hours—and, crowning all, the wind swept faces of boys who die today along the thunder smitten hills of France. The flag of the United States is the Glory of God shining in the faces of those who dream of a world made clean enough to be the dwelling place of God. It turns our sorrows into exultation and our sacrifices into melody of service. For such a flag true men will always gladly die—for such a flag good men will always nobly live.—The International Musician.

Harris Brings Out Several Song Hits.

A manager of one of the best known minstrel companies recently called at the Charles K. Harris offices in search of songs.

For an end number he chose "If You Hear Them Calling Clancey," "He's My Boy," and as a ballad, "Smile When I'm Leaving, Don't Cry When I'm Gone." Several other selections gave equal satisfaction; particularly, "Under the Blue Skies of France," and the new heart ballad, "Why Did You Come Into My Life."

The latest march number, "One, Two, Three, Boys, Over the Top We Go," is counted a big success, as is also the novelty ballad, "Bring Back Those Bygone Days to Me."

In the leading vaudeville houses, "Hello, Girlie," "Liberty Glide," "Sweetness, Honeysuckle of Mine," "At the Allies' Flower Garden Ball" and "Break the News to Mother," are making a decided impression.

Mr. Harris now has a number of manuscripts ready and they give promise of equal popularity with his already published musical successes.

THE WINDJAMMERS.

By Harold Willard Gleason.

They sing the praise of infantry
Which messes up the Huns,
An' also of artillery
That works the bloom'n' guns;
The engineers an' cavalry
An' aviators, too,
All get their share of glory—
An' they earn it, very true—
But there's one branch of the service
They never think to praise,
Though deservin' it, by Pershing!
In a hundred different ways:

Chorus.

It's the windjammers, the windjammers,
The regimental bands!
An' it's many men are thankin' God
For some bass drummer's hands!
For they help to carry wounded
When the bearers ain't about;
When you get yours in No Man's Land
It's "blowhards" pulls you out!

They're a scraggy lookin' outfit
Of all sizes, sorts and shapes,
An' their mouths are mostly puckered
Like they're eatin' sour grapes.
But they cheer us to the trenches
Through the shrapnel, mud an' rain,
An' when our bit is over,
Sure, they play us back again!

Chorus.

Oh, the windjammers, the windjammers,
The regimental bands!
You can see the shoulders straighten
As we pass the "blowhards' stands.
They may not snipe the Fritziess
An' they may not cross the top,
But when "cheero" stuff is needed
They keep playin' till they drop!

Flammer Secures Sidney Homer's Latest.

It is seldom that a composer writes lyrics in every way equal to his music. It is all the more gratifying, then, to discover a song to which the composer has contributed a beautiful poem.

Sidney Homer has just written a song called "Homeland," which, not only his friends, but many musicians, not personally interested, consider the best he has ever done. It has a message for the whole world:

There's a homeland, a true land,
Across the sea,
Where they watch and wait,
And trust in me,
I'll go back to that land
When my task is done;
I'll go back to that land
When my fight is won,
And say to them that mourn:
"God's peace is yours forever more."

This song has just been published in two keys by Harold Flammer, Inc.

Music for the Picture

Conducted by GEORGE W. BEYNON

The Proper Presentation of Pictures Requires Careful Choice of Incidental Music

Part 1.

MANY orchestral leaders regard the theme as the chief factor in a musical setting. Their energies being directed toward making it so, and in the focusing upon one musical item, they foreshorten their vision, losing the larger view of the general picture presentation. The theme then becomes a jagged rock projecting toward heaven from a drab and somewhat level ground composed of trivial and inconsequential melodies.

Many plays have failed, not because of the poor acting of the star, nor for lack of plot, but because the supporting cast did not support. The artistic acting of the principal role stood away from that of the "small parts" so unmistakably that there seemed no connection between them. Thus an auditor would be led to believe that he was viewing two plays upon the same stage all for the one price of admission. He might not regret the box office toll if the star occupied the stage the entire evening, but the weak cast spoiled the show.

There are four ways to open a feature: Some play the theme while the characters are introduced, and the main title with its accompanying sub-titles, recounts who is to blame for that which follows. A carefully selected number in which is embodied the general atmosphere or dominant emotion of the play sometimes ushers in the picture. Then again, there are those careless and lazy musicians who play anything neutral and new to save themselves trouble. The fourth, and perhaps the most inexcusable way of presenting the feature, is allowing it to be screened in silence. When we say silence—musical silence is meant, for when the music is tacet there is always the clicking of the operating machine to be heard, in addition to the whispered spelling out of names and titles.

The use of the theme at screening is frequently the best choice, especially if the picture lacks atmosphere of a characteristic nature, for it impresses itself upon the minds of the audience at once because of the paucity of action in the film. Nevertheless, owing to the frequency with which it is employed later, it is better to refrain from using it unless the necessity really arises.

The best choice of incidental music to start a musical setting is always one in which is found the general sentiment of the picture or the atmosphere in which the play is cloaked. This sometimes requires a marked degree of discretion. The leader must know his musical history and be an adept in picking out one school from the other.

An experience which illustrates this occurred in the presentation of one of these super features, for which a special score was arranged and an augmented orchestra engaged. The plot was highly dramatic in character, and the arranger, wishing to musically prepare the minds of the audience for what they might expect, opened with Espana Rhapsody. Immediately the patrons were imbued with the fact that the picture would be Spanish in atmosphere. Much to their surprise and disgust the first scene opened in Paris, while the orchestra still played the music of Spain. Not once during the entire eight reels was there a glimpse of any location that was not French. The plot was French, the acting was French, the costumes were French, and all typically so. Later the music became French also, but somewhat apologetic, as though feeling its guilt and fearing the censure of its auditors.

Never introduce a Japanese picture by playing an Egyptian serenade, for there will surely be a son of Nippon grinding his teeth somewhere in the audience. An excuse that there is but little Japanese music may have some good ground to stand on, but this does not make it valid, for there is certainly enough to fit one picture, and few exhibitors run two Japanese pictures in consecutive order. If the leader can fit one he can fit all by a simple arrangement of ballads, marches, intermezzos or serenades.

The fellow that uses the first portion of the picture to "try out" a new number deserves no consideration. He is throwing away a golden opportunity for a good beginning which might set the stamp of merit upon his work. He is deliberately insulting the intelligence of the audience, who, with half an eye, can see that he is "practising." He is remiss in his duty to his employer and is flagrantly unconscious of the interests of the producer, who made it possible that the musician might extend his field of endeavors.

Silence is unforgivable, as we have shown in a recent article dealing with that subject. No picture should start in silence under any conditions.

The time will come when the picture will be preceded by a musical overture, in which will be found the theme and the principal melodies of the score to follow, blended together in much the same form as a grand opera overture. The picture will be screened at a point in the music which will allow for the finish of the overture at the commencement of the first scene depicted. Then will the recognition of picture music be complete, and it will take its rightful place by the side of grand operas and symphonies.

"Salome" Score Sets a New Standard.

The score's the thing—for pictures. Cue sheets may be the first aid to the injured, but a musical score is the cure. It makes a picture speak in atmospheric terms that are readily and simply comprehensible.

William Fox is presenting his big biblical drama, "Salome," at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre, accompanied by an orchestra of twenty-four musicians directed by George M. Rubenstein. Mr. Rubenstein arranged the score, and we can conscientiously say that it ranks with the best in all points, and sets a new standard in some.

Mr. Rubenstein's scores run to long selections, chosen with great care and an eye to detail of screen action. No difficulties are encountered in setting a feature with one hundred and four numbers, but there is a real art in properly portraying a picture with twenty-five. "Salome" has the usual number of short scenes, but the long selections have in them changes of tempi and rhythm that suit several short scenes without change. The idea of the dominant emotion prevails throughout the entire score, the climaxes are well worked up, the atmosphere is held completely and the music, though ably supporting the screen action, does not predominate at any point.

The high lights of the music was brought forth in the poisoning of Naomi, the homecoming of Herod and the storm scene in the palace culminating in the death of Salome. A love theme was used that conveyed the wilfulness and cunning of the heroine, while at the same time it breathed but passionate love. Herod was given a martial theme that fitted him well. Then there was a little original number signifying the plotting of evil. This number was most typical in its appeal.

The most hypocritical mind could find no flaws in the music, but we feel that the finale is not strictly in keeping with the spirit of the last scene, depicting the crushing to death of Salome. At the title "Kill her" the storm music should cease abruptly and a paraphrase of the theme of John the Baptist close the picture. This theme was a fine piece of original writing, symbolizing the imperishable faith in God, majestic in rhythm and fervently religious in character. By introducing dissonant and weird harmonies and playing it grandioso, the moral motive of the picture showing the triumph of John the Baptist even after death would have been wonderfully exemplified.

"Salome" music is another milestone on the road of scores, and we congratulate Mr. Rubenstein upon the effective manner by which he takes his auditors to Palestine and keeps them there for the entire evening.

The Servant of Solomon Visits Rialto.

"O King live forever! This day thy servant hath seen many new sights pleasing to the eye and sounds to the ear more pleasing.

"O King live forever!

"Thy poor servant didst journey to that far-famed house of mirth, called the Rialto, and ruled over by one, of the house of Rothapfel with his overseer, one Reisenfeld.

"Lo and behold, O mighty King, when thy lowly servant had entered therein, there stretched before his eyes a multitude of people, intently listening to music made by a great number of men playing upon strange instruments and directed by one, who waved a wand to and fro in rhythmic fashion.

"Wondrous was the music, in a manner Capricious, in atmosphere Spanish, and written by a man who comes of the barbarians upon the Russian steppes. Wierd was the movement of the sounds and seemingly divided into five parts. Some of the populace, kindly inclined, told us that the man Reisenfeld, a chief among men, directed and controlled the music. Never hath thy benighted servant heard the like; neither at Ephesus nor Tarsus, Athens nor Carthage.

"O King, live forever!

"Hardly had the last strain died away and the people's acclaim subsided, when, lo and behold; there arose before us a vision of far distant lands. Truly it was not a mirage nor was it the workings of our trick-playing brain for, verily, it moved, and other lands, other trees and lakes loomed up before us. And the birds were seen to fly; the lapping waves threw crested foam. And all the while, music of wildness and savagery permeated the air, like to that of the natives in the Caribbean Isles.

"All too soon did this pass and our ears were greeted by the flute-like tones of a beautiful damsel, who sang in a foreign tongue, a song called Jeanne D'Arc. From the house of Rosner came this maid, whose Christian name was Annie, and great was the applause that greeted the end of the song.

"O King, live forever!

"Long years hath thy servant ministered unto thee and never failed in speaking the truth. Credit his unworthy words when he tells thee another moving vision appeared like unto the first, but marked in difference. Men were seen marching, ships at sea, prominent speakers and the chief of the tribe of Roosevelt. All were animated and seemed to live, yet no sound came but the sharp and lively music, which ever changed in speed.

"Another singer came forth and we heard the strange tale about the paradise of the Etheopians from Africa, written by one Meyerbeer, he of the unworthy race called Hun. Well was it sung, and the music withal was good, save for a weakness which seemed to overcome the players when the singer took a very high note and seemed so lonely with his tone. 'Twas said the singer lacked support.

"Again there came the moving vision. It told a tale of pirates bold and bad, of hidden treasure, wicked men and wily thieves, of true devotion and brilliant bravery. We saw a fair damsel of the house of Lee, Lila by name, save the ship, rescue her father, unearth the treasure and promise betrothal to her lover. Creepy was the music and well-suited to the tale as it was unfolded before our eyes. As the scene changed, so changed the music, and verily the music portrayed the inaudible sounds of the actors.

"O King, live forever!

"The end is not yet. More music followed and then another tale, not so well told, but created for laughter. Light and frolicsome were the actors and many foolish things did they do for the enjoyment of the assembled people.

"Then, O King, thy servant fell from grace and dignity of mien. His laughter did well up within him and could not be restrained. Fearing that strange eyes might see the foolishness of the servant of Solomon and heap upon thee, O King, derision and contumely, he did run away and straightway hasten thither that thou mightest know of the wonders at the Rialto Theatre during this week commencing the sixth day of the tenth month of this year of thy noble reign."

The Strand Music Falls Far Below Par.

One swallow does not make a meal nor, two birds a summer and, by the same token, two bright spots in a musical program only mitigate its offensiveness, but cannot eradicate its faultiness.

The vocal rendition of the Berceuse from Jocelyn accompanied by cello—the program announced a violin obligato—and harp was delightful. Each artist showed to good advantage and the general ensemble was splendid. The trio made a pretty tableau and received a well merited curtain call.

Herbert Watrous, the well-known basso, is always good. He seemed to be suffering from a cold, but it did not seriously interfere with his singing of the "Bedouin Love Song." As a second number, he sang Van Alstyne's "Buy Bonds for Your Boy and Mine." This met with a spontaneous and patriotic reception.

Our pre-eminent desire is to close the review at this point, for, truly readers who quail at the sight of a mangled form and whom the sight of gore turns pale, should now turn to the next article.

A. Reiser held the helm of the good ship, Music for the Pictures, and tried to steer a course free from rocks and shoals. Either his eyesight failed him or some one had tampered with his chart and compass.

The conducting of the Overture, "Mignon," was without exception the most puerile attempt we have ever witnessed. In the first place, the orchestra is too small to adequately perform a work which calls into play every section of the orchestra in constant contrapuntal melodies. In the second place, Mr. Reiser seemed unfamiliar with the score and, lastly, there was a perceptible lack of unity in the attacks and endings.

The pictorial review was played to the beating of time in a circle while the director searched for some music that seemed to be missing from his stand. No attempt was made to keep the tempo of marching men and the "breaks" came in the middle of well defined musical phrases. After each, there was considerable silence and at times these waits became so long that wagers could be laid that the orchestra had finished its work for the evening.

A selection, with the unmistakable atmosphere of Spain in its introduction, was used for an Italian scene. Still in Italy, the orchestra suddenly changed to an English march when Tommy Atkins was shown. Why change the musical atmosphere when the location remains the same?—Englishmen in Italy do not make it England. The introduction of the Belgian National Air, during a short scene dealing with Belgium, brought many patriotic and sympathetic patrons to their feet. At the sixteenth bar, a perfect cadence, the subtitle read, "Miss Farrar sells bonds," and we were brought back to America. The orchestra heeded not the title, but played La Brabanconne to its conclusion, while the audience bobbed up and down in a quandary.

But why proceed further? The musical program offered for the week of September 29 was without exception a disgrace to a reputable motion picture theatre charging an admission of sixty cents.

Popular War Song Chosen by B. S. Moss.

Charles K. Harris, the composer and music publisher, has signed over the picture rights of his popular Spanish-American war song, "Just Break the News to Mother," to B. S. Moss.

The song is to be made the nucleus of a seven-reel feature, upon which work will be begun as soon as possible.

"Ben Bolt" Not Regarded as American.

Surprisingly few people seem inclined to accept "Ben Bolt" as anything but English. This is doubtless due to the fact that the composer of the music chanced to be English by birth, and the writer of the lyrics was "English" by name. But the latter was a native of the United States, so the song rightly belongs among the Folk Songs of America.

Dr. Thomas Dunn English was born in Philadelphia in the summer of 1819. He received the degree of Doctor of Medicine from the University of Pennsylvania when he was only twenty years of age, studied law and was admitted to the bar four years later. In 1859, he removed to Fort Lee, N. J., where he devoted his life to literary pursuits, becoming editor and publisher as well.

While Dr. English was in New York, in 1842, N. P. Willis, editor of the New Mirror, asked him for a gratuitous contribution to the Mirror, intimating that he desired a sea song. Dr. English promised, went home and attempted to make good. Only one line of the sea would come to his mind and that one was embodied in the last verse of the poem as "Ben Bolt of the salt sea gale." From the first, the poem found favor and within the year was reprinted in England.

The poet thought it might be a greater success if set to music. Dominick May wrote an air for it, but it was never printed. Then Dr. English essayed one. This was printed, but it had no sale. A peculiarity of the composition was that it was written entirely for the black keys. Could "Ben Bolt" have been a pirate bold, one wonders?

In 1848, a play was brought out in Pittsburgh. This was called "The Battle of Buena Vista. In it the song of "Ben Bolt" was introduced. A. M. Hunt, an Englishman, had read the words in a newspaper and gave them from memory to Nelson Kneass, calling on his imagination when memory failed him. Kneass adapted a German melody to the lines, and they were sung in the play. The drama died, but the song which played only a minor part in it lived on. A music publisher from Cincinnati bought the copyright, and it was the business success of his life.

Nothing was heard but the song. "Sweet Alice" became the darling of the day. A steamboat in the West and a ship in the East were christened with her name. The one blew up and the other sank, but "Alice" floated on the sea of popular favor, and would not drown. The song was almost as popular in England as here, and was sung on the street and in the drawing-room with equal fervor.

The composer, Nelson Kneass, came of a good English family, but chose a nomadic life. He was at one time a teacher of music in New York; a singer in the Park Theatre; and, afterward, a member of a negro minstrel troupe. A jolly, companionable fellow, he was enemy to no one but himself, but ended a precarious existence in dire poverty. He always complained that he received but a trifle for his musical setting to "Ben Bolt." But the writer of the song received less, as he had nothing—not even a copy of the song published. To add insult to injury, his complaint that the words had been mutilated was met with the unflattering assurance that they were vastly improved thereby.

The song was practically forgotten when it received a new lease of life through Du Maurier's "Trilby" in 1895. A few years ago, the play was revived. At this revival, Miss Phyllis Nielson Terry acted the part of Trilby and sang the song in a delightfully pleasing manner. Again, for a few days, the music was in the air, but it was soon crowded out by more recent and less sentimental music of the popular variety. The last verse seems prophetic:

"There's change in the things I loved,
Ben Bolt.
They have changed from the old to the new."

Notice to the Readers.

The edict has gone forth that production of pictures shall cease for the period of four weeks. This means that new pictures will not be released and consequently no cue sheets will be issued. If you miss a few of them in this department don't blame us, for we aim to only print those which are in advance of release date.

Leader's Service Bureau.

Questions Answered—Suggestions Offered.

Q. WILL you kindly and clearly state your opinion on the use of German music in the playing of pictures? Some people think Beethoven, Bach and Handel are permissible while Wagner, Strauss and the later composers should be shunned. Personally, I agree with this idea. What do you think?

A. In a case of this kind, personal opinion should play no part. We are living in America, citizens of a country fighting for democracy. The feeling against Germany is rightly intense, and we have a duty toward ourselves. Nothing coming from a German source should be played at this time. It is not a question as to whether Beethoven was a Hun; it is a question of patriotism. Every piece of music composed by Germans of any period is inherently propaganda, pleasing to the enemy. If it is pleasing, it gives comfort and thus is treasonable. Look to the noble Frenchman for music that will fit your needs. He is our ally and every piece of his music which you buy is helping him and our cause.

Q. Where can I procure a representative library cheap?

A. Many leaders are selling their libraries on account of the draft. We will be pleased to send you the addresses of such when we hear of their desire to sell. Why not try the "Music Service Exchange?" They might help you.

Q. What is the latest march by Sousa, and where can I get it?

A. We do not know the latest, but a very recent one is "Solid Men to the Front," published by G. Schirmer, Inc.

Q. I wish to compliment you upon the cue sheet service in the Moving Picture World. Would it be possible to induce all the producers to accept this uniform standardization? I am sure all leaders will welcome it.

A. Thanks. We will try to induce.

Q. The military bands have increased to proportions almost incredible, some being six hundred strong. Where is the advantage?

A. Personally, we see no advantages and many disadvantages. Band arrangements are usually made for thirty-three men and a band of six hundred would naturally require nineteen sets of orchestration for every one performed. This means much music weight and difficulty in procuring same. Besides a big band of that size is more or less unwieldy to direct and maneuver.

Q. Where can I procure all the orchestral numbers written by George Drumm?

A. At G. Schirmer's, Inc., New York.

Q. I can play a Wurlitzer pipe organ and am looked upon as a fine picture player. My experience has been long and varied. Where can I get a position?

A. Use the classified ads of the Moving Picture World as a medium. A position is now open and we are writing you full particulars.

George M. Cohan Writes for Olcott.

Geo. M. Cohan is writing all the songs in the new play he recently finished for Chauncey Olcott. These numbers will be published by M. Whitmark & Sons.

These music publishers put out Mr. Cohan's tremendous march song success, "When You Come Back, And You Will Come Back, There's the Whole World Waiting for You."

"I'm True to Them All, and They're Just as True to Me," is the title of a new song written by Mr. Cohan. It has been introduced into Klaw & Erlanger's "The Girl Behind the Gun," being specially written for this show, and forming one of the most conspicuous singing successes of the piece. This song is written in the liveliest Cohanesque vein, and bids fair to attain the same measure of popularity that all this versatile writer's numbers invariably achieve.

Ballad Approved by Famous Producer.

A few days after D. W. Griffith launched his supreme masterpiece, "Hearts of the World," the great producer was besieged by composers and song-writers offering compositions bearing the name of the production.

At first, Mr. Griffith gave little heed to these manuscripts, because the music for the play had already been compiled and printed, and he did not feel that he was justified in making any interpolations. But the compositions became so

"ANTONY AND CLEOPATRA"

By

R. GRUNWALD

Published by Ditson & Co.
Boston—New York.

This is an Oriental Suite comprising

1. In the Arbor—Andante con moto.
2. Dance of the Nubians—Allo. Moderato.
3. Solo Dance—tempo, di minuet.
4. Antony's Victory—tempo di Marcia.

These four movements speak for themselves and we heartily recommend this suite to every leader who desires a well stocked library.

numerous that he finally decided to give them his attention. After going over several of them, he called his general musical director, Mr. Elinor, and several co-workers and members of his company together, and asked them to form an opinion and make a selection. After a week's hard work, it was agreed that the song submitted by James W. Casey, of New York City, was best suited to "Hearts of the World," and, in compliment to Mr. Casey, a telegram of endorsement was sent to this composer.

"Hearts of the World," published by the Echo Publishing Co., was first introduced at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre in New York, and immediately became a favorite. In every city where the Griffith production is offered, the fame of the song seems to have reached.

Rialto Orchestra Features "Il Guarany."

"Il Guarany," by Gomez, was the overture opening the bill at the Rialto Theatre during the week of September 29. This overture for some time was regarded as a rather difficult piece of interpretation, but by constant repetition it has attained a traditional treatment that in a way appears difficult. The Rialto Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Mr. Finston, played well, but the last movement was too fast and there was a tendency toward choppiness in it that detracted.

Miss Josephine Forsythe was programmed to sing an (a) and (b) number composed of "Loch Lomon" and "Coming Thro' the Rye." It is too bad that she did not sing these numbers for her rendition surely would have been better than the one she attempted. "Love Is Best of All," a light operatic solo, calls for range. Miss Forsythe did not show one, though it may have been hidden upon her person somewhere. "Love Is Best of All" requires a little warmth of feeling in portrayal, but the lady seemed cold.

Martin Brefel, a tenor, sang the aria from Flotow's "Martha," in fine voice. His top tones were most pleasing and the bridging of his register showed fine technical training.

The Scenic, dealing with the "Tales of the Tall Timbers," was fitted with an oriental opening. This was poor judgment for it confused the atmosphere. Why use oriental music when a pastorage of natural quality would be most appropriate?

We never fail to marvel at the beautiful settings so simply synchronized for the Animated Magazine. Short numbers are used and this is really the secret of their success. It might be added that well-known melodies play a large part in interpreting the pictorial. Mr. Rothapfel believes in the reinforcement of ideas as well as the association of them.

The feature music is always good and one review becomes so like another that we merely mention it in passing.

The comedy and entr' acts were well played and Marche Militaire, by Schubert, as an organ solo, closed the program.

Music for "Ruling Passions" Pleasing.

At the trade showing of "Ruling Passions," the musical setting proved one of the best we have listened to for a long while. Mr. Luz was responsible for the artistic score and also conducted the large orchestra.

The overture was a bit ragged and the solo instruments had difficulty in cadenzas, but from the commencement of the picture everything went smoothly and in perfect synchrony. The fact that the themes were chosen, not for the principal roles, but for specified emotions, such as Hate, Love, Revenge and Mercy is worthy of special mention and should be followed by all leaders playing this picture.

Another little touch that won comment was the introduction of Cliribribim to typify the Italian organ grinders. The music always was held subservient to the action and proved pleasing throughout.

Producers should endeavor to show their pictures to the best advantage and that can only be done when the musical accompaniment is well selected and carefully played.

Music Aids in Registering Emotions.

There are two reasons why music bears an important relationship to the motion picture. In the first place, appropriate music helps a picture to "get over" to an audience with the emotion sought for by the players.

Music carries its own delicate appeal which is felt by the audience and sways it to the quick pulsating appreciating of the story unfolded on the screen. That is why many studios today have adopted music to assist emotional stars in putting over some great heart-throbbing scene, the strains of the music making the players feel their parts more deeply, thereby obtaining better results. Just as the music helps the artist attain more realistic expression while acting a role, so will it assist the audience in feeling the proper emotions when the same picture is shown on the screen if appropriate music is played.

Another important bearing music has upon the motion picture is in its appeal to the better classes which are being daily drawn to pictures. Music has done a great deal in elevating the standard of motion picture audiences, and I dare say that in a few years no picture theatre, however small, will be without its orchestra.

Music for the Picture

Conducted by GEORGE W. BEYNON

The Evolution of Picture Music Is the Result of Conscientious Effort

Part I.

BACK in the days of the store front "Movies," there was noise with the picture instead of music for the photoplay. The film was run in silence except for the beating of the big drum outside, for the purpose of drawing the crowds to this new form of side show. Intermittently might be heard the voice of the "barker" droning his droll catch-phrases, informing the inquisitive populace that for "One dime, ten cents, or a tenth part of a dollar," they could see "the greatest wonder of the age, the cinematograph showing MOV-ING PIC-CHURES." The greater the merits of this one-reeler, the greater the noise which accompanied it.

That was in 1903—not so far back as we count years—but from the standpoint of the film industry, dimly in the distant and distasteful past. Following closely upon the discovery that the "movie" fad could become a great entertainment institution, a few progressives installed a piano to entertain the audience, which arrived early and were forced to wait until there were sufficient paid admissions to warrant starting the show. Those were the days when they "packed 'em in," rushed the five hundred feet through, and began packing them in again for another speedy depletion of their dimes. During the "packing" process, the pianist regaled the seated ones with some music, mostly apropos of nothing, being an extemporization hastily improvised from his admittedly fertile brain—that is, he admitted the fertility.

The moment the lights went out, and he could no longer be seen, he refused to be heard and took himself off to one of the back exits to enjoy a cigarette in quiet. The shuffling of retreating feet was the signal to again begin work and, having mentally composed a marvelous little ditty while under the influence of nicotine, he straightway rushed in and perpetrated it upon the piano and the incoming crowd.

Yes, indeed, those were the halcyon times! Sometimes as many as twenty shows were run off in a day if the crowds were eager; if not, the number fell away to ten. Rainy days were the betes noir of the showman and the ballyhoo man, the latter being forced to don his mackintosh and rubber boots, calling his wares from beneath the shade of an umbrella. Likewise, the pianist dreaded wet weather for the piano was slow to fill up and his working hours became longer in the aggregate.

By accident, a conscientious musician must have slipped into the ranks, for it is recorded that one so far forgot himself as to play soft music for a particularly touching death-bed scene. The records go further and inform us that it received much applause—not the death-bed scene—but the innovation. That young man started something. He had fitted music to a portion of the plot and, though it was only one scene and, in all probability, the big moment of the picture, his idea was the tiny seed from which has sprung up a profession enlisting over forty thousand musicians.

Naturally the next step was the rearrangement of the duties of the pianist.

Let the people wait in silence! His work had become too valuable in accompanying the picture to permit the playing of interludes. He was called upon to play for all the scenes and use his own judgment. He did both. His playing was bad, but his judgment was worse; so they brought the big drum from the outside and hired a man to liven up the "music."

Well, if "music" means life, that "Movie" house became the liveliest place in town. It resolved itself into a question in the minds of the performers as to whom could make the most noise, and it simply had to be decided one way or the other. The pianist averred that the drum was not a musical instrument and he could prove it by crashing chords and glistening glissandos. On the other hand, the loyal mind of the drummer could not conceive of superiority in an instrument called to sound by twiddling fingers. Never should it be said that Big Bass Drum, his little brother, Snare Drum, and his first cousin, Cymbal, allowed a mere piano to out-voice the great family of Percussion. That started something else.

Whereas the first era of picture accompaniment gave us noise on the outside, the second produced greater din on the inside. In the excitement of the contest, the participants forgot all about the picture and lovelorn he-ros be-moaned their sad lot to the accompaniment of musical cannonading, while Death, Despair, Distress, and Deep Grief stalked through the story to the same thundrous racket.

This phase of picture playing grew worse even in spite of the fact that almost all the showmen followed the lead and installed pianos. Nowhere was there to be found peace, and the patrons complained bitterly. It was too much—too much noise and too little show for too much money. This condition had to be changed—and it was, slightly.

A violinist was introduced into this harmonious group, to produce a modicum of sweetness. The drummer was admonished to restrain his arm exercises and the pianist was expected to co-operate with the newcomer. This trio paid more attention to the picture and followed it after a fashion, but therein lay the fault. They followed it instead of fitting it. Nevertheless, much progress was made toward the right objective and through their mistakes they were learning.

Of course it was not to be expected that they should play continuously. Oh no! They only played during those scenes which appealed to them as holding possibilities for music with which they were conversant.

Coincident with the advent of the "fiddler," there appeared by the drummer's side a few more members of the Percussion family.

There was Baby Triangle, with her tiny voice, Sister Bell, to provide church atmosphere and another first cousin, Chinese Gong. They brought with them other more distant relatives to produce special mechanical effects, such as coconut shells for hoof-beats, a ratchet block, sand block, and a box of glass. In fact, it looked as though the Percussion family was holding reunion that was meant to be permanent. The dismal sounds emanating from that quarter led one to suspect that father and mother were absent.

Notwithstanding the mediocrity of the artists in their picture accompaniment, the people liked the music and said so. This pleased the managers and they began looking around for musical novelties to prolong the short shows. The store front was going and the little theatre, having a three to six hundred seating capacity, was arriving.

About this time, Mitchell Mark opened the Comique Theatre in Boston, in which he built an orchestral pit of such depth that the musicians were entirely hidden from the view of the audience. His idea met with unanimous approval and another step had been taken for the advancement of picture music.

Mr. Marks established himself as an ultra progressive when, in 1907, he opened the Alhambra Theatre on Euclid avenue in Cleveland, in which there was installed the first church organ to be used in the "movies." He also engaged an orchestra of eight pieces to create a pleasing ensemble and for the accompaniment of vocalists, one of whom appeared on each program. The scale of prices ranged from ten to fifty cents.

It must be remembered that pictures were still released in single reel lengths only, and it is rather interesting to note the arrangement of the program which consisted of the following, in the order named: An Orchestral Overture; Scenes from Shadowland; Organ Solo; Scenes from Shadowland; Vocal Selection; Scenes from Shadowland; and Exit March.

This program was evolved by Mr. Marks and grew under the excellent management of Mr. Harold Edell. It was the forerunner of the picture palace and its galaxy of musical talent.

Hezekiah Hiram Hears Strand Music.

IT WAS Sunday night, October 25, when we arrived at the spacious portals of the Strand lobby. We were more than surprised, and a bit disconcerted, to find in the long lines of humanity eager for tickets an old friend. Hezekiah Hiram was his cognomen, and he hails from the "tall timbers," where a little plot of ground, which he boastfully calls a farm, gives him and his family daily sustenance.

After the long-lost-brother stuff had been duly performed and our tickets had been taken, we found seats. From the moment we entered the auditorium until the close of the performance, "Hez"—we called him that for short, when we wanted to borrow money—kept up a running commentary upon the various musical offerings. Hezekiah, being the "champeen" harmonica player of Berkshire county, "By Heck," his opinion upon musical matters was highly rated among his fellows.

"Wal, I'll be swizzled if that there orchestr' ain't the biggest I seen since I was in Boston. That Czardas, I reckon be a dance that comes from somewhere in the war zone. It certainly sounds mighty good."

He was right. The overture conducted by Carl Edouarde, was good in the full significance of the word. The crowded theatre showed its appreciation unmistakably.

After the Topical Review, which was played vigorously but not always in time with the marching soldiers, Hiram broke out again.

"Wal, I swan, if that ain't one of the usher gals up there singin' that 'Down in Mobile' song."

"Not 'Down in Mobile, Hez,' but 'La Donna E Mobile' from the opera 'Rigoletto,' we replied.

"Be that as it may, it sounds mighty like a man dressed up like a woman to me," he said.

"This lady, old friend, is a female tenor and sings the great arias from grand opera as easily as Caruso. Watch her breathing, note her clear enunciation, her diction, and clean-cut attacks. Isn't she wonderful?" we queried.

He did not reply, for at that moment Miss Jane Holden finished her song and the audience simply screamed their applause. It was truly an ovation and merited indeed. Miss Holden's voice is remarkable and her singing portrays the highest technical form without the usual machine-like precision that take away soulfulness.

Another real artiste, Alys Michot, rendered the "Bell Song" from "Lakme" and proved herself most adept in coloratura roles. The opening cadenza is one of the biggest things in opera because of its long duration without accompaniment. Many of the noted singers fall below the key before they reach the song proper, but Miss Michot held the pitch perfectly.

The entire performance was meritorious. Mr. Edouarde paid close attention to synchrony, and, although sometimes he was forced to run over the cues to reach his musical cadence by "pulling" the orchestra, the break was made imperceptible.

As we ambled out, Hezekiah seemed in a brown study. He was cogitating. Now, when a Hiram begins cogitating there's sure to be a surprising denouement. And there was. As if some inner force propelled the words from his body he exclaimed:

"All they need in that orchestr' is a good strong harmonica player, and, by Dad, I'm goin' to apply to Mr. Strand before I'm another day older."

Rivoli Music for Pictorial Perfect.

The Rivoli orchestra opened the performance with the presentation of "Mignon" overture, conducted by Erno Rapee. The Horn solo was particularly pleasing and the general orchestral ensemble was fine.

"Midst Peaceful Scenes" showed valleys and mountains, rivers and rivulets, forests and glades. It was truly pastorale and peaceful, yet the first selection used was most grandioso in its style. The second choice was better.

"Gypsy Airs," by Sarasate, played as a violin solo by Alberto Bachmann, proved pleasing. During the lento movement, the curtain fell back, showing the candle lighted cell of a monk, with a little harmonium occupying the center of the room. This setting was very artistic and in keeping with the music.

The Animated Pictorial was wonderful from the musical standpoint. It was 100 per cent. artistic, suitable and synchronous. We know that is strong praise, but even that does not express the merit of the setting.

Glady Rice, soprano, sang "The Last Rose of Summer." Seated on a bench with a big moon rising behind her in the night sky, she made a pretty silhouette which conveyed more to the audience than the singing. Of course the proverbial rose was in evidence, but added nothing to the general good effect. To create the atmosphere for the song, the orchestra played part of "In the Gloaming."

The fitting of the feature, "A Woman of Impulse," was splendid. Opening with characteristic Italian folk songs, it proceeded smoothly into the overture from "Carmen." Then, as parts of the opera were shown, the music belonging to them was used. The "Habanera" we felt, could have been replaced by the "Seguidilla," and more made out of the scene. The theme for the heroine was Nevin's "Venetian Love Song," and nothing else could have been chosen that would portray her better.

Pershing Says Music Is Essential.

When General Pershing arrived in France, he immediately discovered a great difference, on comparison, between the French and American military bands. He found the French military bands were never less than fifty instrumentalists, and a drum and bugle corps of from 25 to 30. He took immediate steps to have the military bands of the U. S. increased from 28 to 50. Since then the Government has opened schools of instruction for army musicians, which already has caused great improvement. The improvement would be still more marked if the military had a distinct unit of their own, instead of being attached to the headquarter, non-commissioned staff. That may come in time, through either orders of the commander-in-chief, or Congressional legislation. Let us pray that it may come speedily.

The press dispatches credit General Pershing with making another improvement which means much to the bands of the military service of the country.

Since bands were first made a part of the military service, about three centuries ago, the bandsmen have always been detailed as stretcher bearers during battle. The present system of war is entirely different from what it was formerly. Then, battles were fought in the open, and rarely lasted longer than one day. Now, war is a matter of trench warfare, and is a continuous affair. The men of the trenches are frequently relieved for rest and recuperation. When they return to their billets, they need not only rest, but recreation, and recreation without music is unthinkable. But the members of the bands are at the front acting as stretcher bearers. The Doughboys, immortalized by this war as the knightliest soldiers that ever bore arms, growled, like good soldiers often do, on account of the absence of their bands, and those growls finally reached General Pershing's ears. He at once recognized, like a good old soldier, that there was some merit in the doughboys' growl, as to their being deprived of music while recuperating for the next scrap with the Boche. So he issued an order that bandsmen should be withdrawn from stretcher service, and still there are some people whose souls are so dead that they insist that music is a special invention of his Satanic Majesty to corrupt the souls of mankind. "The Old Oaken Bucket," by Woodworth.

On a poor, run-down farm in Scituate, Mass., in January, 1785, there came into the world Samuel Woodworth, a child of poverty, who never lived to experience anything else except for a few rare and fleeting moments and at long divided intervals.

His life began prosaically enough, and he dragged through the years too lacking in ambition to work and with no taste for study. At fourteen, he had acquired only the most superficial knowledge of the "Three Rs," but he had, seemingly, a natural talent for writing, and had already composed several short poems. These verses were submitted to the village school master and the local minister. Both gentlemen were greatly impressed and pronounced the literary effusions remarkable. The minister took the lad into his family and conscientiously tried to teach him Latin and English. But the boy scribbled away his time and refused to study. The preacher seemed not easily discouraged, for he, in conjunction with the aforesaid school teacher, tried to interest some of the wealthy people to the extent of providing a fund whereby the young Samuel could be sent to college. But the attempt was abortive and his future education was given up.

Then Woodworth took matters into his own hands and decided upon printing as a profession, going to Boston to learn the intricacies of the trade. However, at the end of his apprenticeship, he tired of the routine work, and became a wanderer—a tramp printer—stopping for a few days' work as funds failed him, in towns through which he passed.

Eventually, he drifted to New York, where he established a newspaper, procuring an outfit on credit. He christened his venture "The Belles Lettres Repository." As might have been naturally predicted, the undertaking proved a failure. Once more the wander-lure seized him, and history repeated itself. But New York evidently had some charm for him, as finally he gravitated back again and selfishly divided the miseries of his poverty-stricken existence with a wife and four children.

During the war of 1812-15, Mr. Woodworth conducted a weekly newspaper called "The War." He also equally well mismanaged a monthly magazine, and the result was inevitable. Again he repaired to a printing office and accepted work as the lesser of two evils. He seems to have made a somewhat good impression in this place, for he was asked to write, in the style of a romance, a history of the war with England. It was entitled "The Champions of Freedom." No one reads it now, but at the time it was so popular that the printing was begun when only two sheets were written.

This little history became the rage, and it brought Woodworth before the public. Two reliable publishing houses offered to collect, illustrate and publish his poems, accompanied by a sketch of his life. If the man had only been gifted with sufficient ambition, he could have amassed a fortune before his popularity waned. But he let his opportunity slip by as usual.

"The Old Oaken Bucket" was written in the summer of 1819, when, with his long-suffering family, the poet was living in Duane street, New York City. One day he came in, tired and thirsty. He poured out a glass of water and drained it. As he set the glass down, he exclaimed: "That is very refreshing, but how much more so would it be to take a good, long draught from the old oaken bucket I left hanging in the well at my father's home." His wife said: "Wouldn't that be a pretty subject for a poem?" At this suggestion he seized a pen and, as the picture of his childhood home rose vividly to his fancy, he wrote the words which have lived for a century and the only one of all his writings that is at all known at this time.

The name of Frederick Smith appears as the composer of the music, but he was merely the arranger. An adaptation of Kjalmark's music for Moore's "Araby's Daughter" furnished the melody.

Questions Answered—Suggestions Offered.

Q. I am a clarinet player in an orchestra of three pieces, and there have been complaints that all the audience can hear is the clarinet. In spite of the fact that I play as softly as possible, the instrument still stands out above the others. How can I remedy it?

A. The clarinet has no place in a three-piece orchestra, and if the reed effect is required, we would suggest that you play a baritone saxophone reading from the cello part. Even under those conditions it would be necessary to hold in all the time.

Q. Would you give me a list of Grieg numbers which would be suitable for pictures?

A. All Grieg's music is especially adapted for pictures and wonderfully effective for scenes which are atmospheric. The following list are those which are most frequently used:

- Norwegian Dance Asra
- No Spring Repose of the Forest
- Temple Dance With a Violet
- Bridal Procession Arabian Dance
- Three Lyric Pieces At Home
- A Dream Suite No. 1 and No. 2

Allegretto

Q. Who was the composer of the American opera "Bianca," and has it been performed in America?

A. Henry Hadley is the composer of the one-act opera which had its first presentation at the Park Theatre in New York towards the end of last season. It is published by Harold Flammer, Inc.

Q. I see in the advertisements in your department mention of the Professional School of Picture Playing. Would you explain what it consists and whether it is as your recommendation or not?

A. We are pleased to recommend the Professional School of Picture Playing as the one and only school of the kind in the country. Its faculty is composed of experienced musicians in picture playing, and they have taken over the Strand Theatre in Los Angeles, where every day features are screened and students instructed in the art of playing them.

Q. Our theatre has been closed because of influenza for four or five weeks and, as I am the organist, there is nothing for me to do during that time. Nothing has been said about paying salaries. Can I collect?

A. If your theatre has been closed by the local Board of Health, the law provides that you should receive salary for the full period unless two weeks' notice is given that your services will no longer be required. If you are a member of the Musicians' Union two weeks' notice must be given anyway.

Q. Is the Caruso advertised to appear in pictures the same Caruso who sings in Opera?

A. It is indeed.

Q. Who are the noted conductors or musical directors in New York who specialize in symphony work?

A. Joseph Stransky, Conductor of the Philharmonic Society; Walter Damrosch, Director of the New York Symphony; Modest Altschuler, Conductor of the Russian Symphony; Arnold Volpe, Conductor of Young Men's Symphony Orchestra; Christian Kriens, of the Kriens' Symphony Club.

Q. Who wrote "Freedom for All Forever," and where can I get it?

A. Lieut. B. C. Hilliam was the composer, and M. Witmark & Sons, New York, are the publishers.

Q. Can you tell me whether the following composers are living and of what nationality they were: Boito, Debussy, Charpentier and Parry?

A. Arrigo Boito, an Italian composer known for his opera, "Mefistofele," died in the last year. Debussy also passed away recently, much admired by his fellow countrymen in France. Charpentier, we believe, is still alive and also in France. Parry is a little known Englishman who died last year after bringing forth some works that astounded the musical public.

"The Battle Hymn of Democracy" Music.

Music is said to embody the expression of the most secret emotions and to be the audible outreaching of the human soul toward the Infinite.

The Great War is the grandest tumult of all time. It has been like the majestic sweep of the God of nature in a great storm.

Perhaps it is the majesty of the action that has inspired such universal heroism among the soldiers.

With all this as an inspiration, "The Battle Hymn of Democracy" has been written. The song is stately and majestic, yet full of variety and color and has an unmistakable appeal.

have prepared a new piano and organ accompaniment and are having a new band orchestration written. This music, they feel, will properly interpret the spirit of the song and become a fitting setting for the splendid thought it expresses.

Liberty Loan Drive Boosted by Song.

"O never a Fritz shall sail
On a ship that sails with me,
Never a box or bale

That smells of Germany."

Thus the chorus of the song runs. It is not at all surprising that the new song, "The Likes of They," did such excellent service in the Fourth Liberty Loan Drive when it embodies the above sentiments.

This song, the lyrics of which are by A. P. Herbert and the music by C. A. Lidgey, is not a gem of literature and was not intended to be such. But it breathes the spirit of the men who are fighting to free the world from the machinations of the Huns, and is written in an idiom that appeals to our hearts.

The publishers, Chappel & Co., Ltd., are to be congratulated upon this song so full of heart appeal. It should become very popular, particularly with our boys in khaki.

Music for the Picture

Conducted by GEORGE W. BEYNON

The Evolution of Picture Music Is the Result of Conscientious Effort

Part III.

Theatres were assuming larger proportions and the time was ripe for more innovations. Here entered Mr. and Mrs. Tympani to complete the family reunion of Percussion. The family now being together and in conclave solemn, it was to be expected that there would be some momentous upheaval in the realm of picture music, and there was.

During the slow growth of the cue sheets, musical scores crept into existence. The Essanay Company of Chicago produced a feature of five reels accompanied by a piano score which could be played on the organ. These scores were rented to the exhibitor at fifty cents a day and proved very helpful in properly interpreting the picture, but were not a financial gain to the company. This was in 1912, and there were no further experiments in musical scores until the run of "The Birth of a Nation" in New York during the year 1915.

The music for "The Birth of a Nation" will go down in the annals of the history of the film industry as an epoch of greatest importance. It was arranged for an orchestra of forty pieces and was clearly synchronized to the minutest detail. Joseph Breil composed and arranged it and, in so doing, he set a high mark at which future composers might shoot. At the time of writing, after three years of musical advance, "The Birth of a Nation" score still stands as a criterion, and no subsequent score has transcended its beauty or comprehensiveness.

Following closely upon the enthusiastic and popular reception of this famous score, the writer presented at the Broadway Theatre, New York, September 16, 1915, a musical score arranged for the Oliver Morosco picturization of "Peer Gynt."

Never was there a more severe test set for synchrony than this first performance of "Peer Gynt." Because of an unexpected delay in getting the music from the printer, there was no rehearsal, and the writer was forced to conduct a newly gathered together orchestra of fifty instruments through the intricacies of Grieg and at the same time bring the music out coincidentally with the scenes. All went well until Peer Gynt shot the Southerner. Immediately after that there was a scene which was interpreted by using "Dixie." For some unaccountable reason, the shooting was delayed and the orchestra could not, with justice to the merits of the number being played, be held back until the duellists had vindicated their honor. Thus a moment before the shot the orchestra started "Dixie." No doubt at that moment the Southerner wished he was in Dixie, and the appreciative audience thought they were listening to a musical joke perpetrated to relieve the dramatic tension. Nevertheless, it was a bad break and was criticised severely by the daily papers.

If we are conscientious and painstaking in our efforts, we learn by our mistakes, and following scores were more successful.

The Paramount saw the possibilities of this new form of music service, and by an arrangement entered into with G. Schreier, Inc., and the writer, printed orchestral scores for one hundred and sixteen pictures. These were rented to an exhibitor for a nominal fee, and letters of praise were received from hundreds of those deriving benefit therefrom.

But the time was not ripe for such an elaborate form of picture music. The service was poorly advertised and all those interested lost money. It was discontinued—not because the idea was wrong nor because the scores contained little merit—but from the pure lack of support expected from the exchange and the exhibitors.

During this period, S. L. Rothapfel, sometimes called "The Little Napoleon of the picture industry," saw the vast possibilities of the musical part of his program, and, being engaged to open the Strand Theatre on Broadway, gathered together an orchestra of thirty-five expert instrumentalists and installed a large organ as a permanent feature of this new house. Carl Edouarde was engaged to conduct this constellation of artists, and a standard program of merit was conceived, in which singers of reputation had a prominent place.

The Strand became the Mecca, not only for picture "fans," but for all lovers of the truly artistic music. Nothing like it had been seen before; never had the "movies" been run on such a large and elaborate scale. Picture presentation became an art which met with popular favor throughout the country. Live exhibitors everywhere began to pattern their amusement palaces after the Strand model. The name "Movie" lost its significance, and in its place we heard such new dignified terms as "Picture Show," "Temple of the Motion Pictures" and "Picture Palace."

The program opened with an overture of classic nature or excerpts from symphonies or operas. Then followed music fitting an educational subject. A vocal number separated the Scenic from the Pictorial Review, followed by another vocal selection. Then came the feature, an entr'acte by the orchestra, a comedy, and the bill closed with an organ solo.

Music from beginning to end, this program established itself in the hearts of the people and, although only four shows were run daily, the receipts were counted in thousands of dollars.

The musicians who made no pretense of fitting the picture, but calmly sat waiting for a scene to appear that should fit the music they were capable of "faking," had gone and the orchestra pit was to know them no more forever. Their places were filled with competent and painstaking artists who gave the scenes depicted an intelligent attention and who played the music in perfect synchrony.

There is indeed a far cry from the store front of earlier days to the "Picture Palace Beautiful," and a long flight from the big drum to the synchrony orchestra. This astonishing evolution was not brought about suddenly, but only through the slow process of evolution in picture playing, materially assisted and encouraged by the upward trend of film craft and the increased interest and patronage of musically appreciative picture lovers.

Death of Harold Edel Stuns Picturedom.

Active, useful and fruitful in the picture field, drawing to him countless friends because of his sunny disposition, Mr. Harold Edel, managing director of the Strand Theatre, New York, finished his work and passed into the Great Beyond, Saturday, November 3.

Though young in years, Mr. Edel's life was filled to overflowing with managerial activities, and his energetic mentality refused to rest even when it seemed vitally necessary. Had the career of Mr. Edel been turned from executive and business channels into the stream of art, he would have proved a wonderful musician.

From earliest childhood, he loved music, and became fairly proficient as a pianist. It was his good fortune to have many opportunities of hearing the best operas and symphonic works. He reveled in musical color, and being an apt student, soon learned the fundamental principles that distinguish artists from amateurs.

All this stood him in good stead when he undertook the management of picture theatres for the late Mitchell Mark. Mr. Edel's modesty never permitted him to accept the credit for his musical conceptions, and it was characteristic of the man that he should force the crown of achievements accomplished upon the head of his friend and employer.

The passing of Mr. Harold Edel, to many is shocking; to a few, calamitous; and to countless well wishers has created a void impossible to fill. To those of his family suffering in bereavement, we personally extend our inexpressible sympathy.

"Columbia, the Gem of the Ocean."

The peculiar nature of his occupation and a certain amount of leisure which is unavoidable on board ship, have given the sailor many opportunities for music that the average soldier cannot hope to enjoy. Even while at work, the former is far more accustomed to lighten his labors with song than the latter.

Taking these facts into consideration, it is rather surprising that few songs have been written that are distinctly of the ocean in atmosphere.

Among this little group and embodying the spirit of power and patriotism, we have "Columbia, the Gem of the Ocean." It can scarcely be ignored when reviewing our national songs as the words are distinctly American.

So many wordy battles have been fought about it that it would be interesting for that reason if it had no other title to distinction. England has set up some very well-defined claims for it. One English writer very sensibly argued that the "Gem of the Ocean" was far more applicable to the Island of Great Britain than to a large continent, three thousand miles wide, and bounded by land on two sides. In England, the song is called "Britannia, the Pride of the Ocean" and is quite as popular there under that name as in this country by the one with which we have become familiar.

If the tune alone was concerned in the controversy, it would not be quite such a puzzle. But the writer of the American lyrics seems to be equally a question never satisfactorily decided. There were two claimants for the honor, and a surprising amount of valuable time has been wasted trying to substantiate the assertion of one or the other of the two gentlemen interested: Thomas á Becket and David T. Shaw.

Mr. Becket relates this story, which sounds plausible: In the fall of 1843, while he was engaged at the Chestnut Street Theatre, Philadelphia, Mr. Shaw, then singing in the Chinese Museum in the same city, called upon Mr. Becket and requested him to write the music for a song to be used in a benefit given Mr. Shaw. The latter produced some lines which he wished used as a nucleus. Mr. Becket states that these verses were so ungrammatical and so deficient in measure it was impossible to set them to music. He pointed out this fact to Mr. Shaw, who acknowledged the truth of the statement. The two men then went to the house of a friend who had a piano. There Mr. Becket wrote the first two verses in pencil and composed the music. On reaching home again, he added a third verse, arranged the music and made a copy in ink. This he gave to Mr. Shaw, requesting him not to give or sell a copy. Then he adds: "A few weeks later I left for New Orleans and was greatly surprised to see a published copy, entitled 'Columbia, the Gem of the Ocean,' written, composed and sung by David Shaw and arranged by Thomas á Becket, Esq."

Mr. Becket proceeds to relate that upon his return to Philadelphia he called upon the publisher. By him, Mr. Becket was assured that the song had been purchased from Mr. Shaw. Mr. Becket thereupon produced the original pencil written manuscript and claimed the copyright. In a few weeks, the song made its reappearance and the credit was given to Mr. Becket.

The song did not take long to find its way across the ocean, and was sung everywhere in England. Mr. Becket seems to have had a rather difficult task in reserving to himself the honor of writing the song. For, when he visited London in 1847, he again found that the credit had been diverted into other channels and it was accepted everywhere as an English composition. He quaintly adds: "Perhaps it really is, I being an Englishman by birth."

Thus the song, familiarly known as the "Red, White and Blue" flourishes. Its origin is shrouded in claims and counter-claims, but any amount of controversy cannot conceal the fact that it is warmly received as one of our patriotic airs. It breathes a warm national spirit which is a part of our American life and indicative of the spirit which in this present national crisis, has made "Columbia ride safe thro' the storm."

Patriotic Rally for Thanksgiving Day.

A patriotic allegory entitled "Three Stars," the work of Mrs. David Allen Campbell, founder of National Song Day, will be a Thanksgiving Day attraction in motion picture theatres throughout the United States. In connection with this picture the song, "Three Stars," will be sung by the audience. The words are by Charles Knap, and the music is Mrs. Campbell's composition. In the choruses she has used the refrains of three old familiar songs. This fact alone should insure an ovation for the song, aside from the merit of the verses.

Promptly on the stroke of four o'clock, Eastern time, Thanksgiving afternoon, if the splendid idea works out as planned, audiences all over the country will begin the same patriotic song, and there will follow the unfolding of a picture unique in the annals of the screen and universal in its appeal to patriotism.

The allegory consists of five panoramic pictures depicting mankind's slow progress through the ages of Autocracy's oppression down to the present time.

The first picture shows humanity crushed by war, famine and pestilence, heavily burdened by the weapons of Autocracy and crying into omnipotence for deliverance. Following this is a vision of Democracy, with the sword of Jehovah in hand, answering the call to which all the forces of humanity respond.

These epic scenes move in quick succession across the screen, and fade into the dim scene of our American boys answering the call to arms and to the Blue Star of Valor shining overhead, while the audience will be invited to sing the first verse of the song:

"Blue Star of Valor glowing
On service flags of white,
You mark a hero's going
To fight the fight for Right."

The blue star dissolving as the boys march away, the oncoming scene portrays the first defeat of Autocracy in battle—the boys in action—whereupon the Silver Star of Service appears, while the audience sings in unison:

"Bright star of Silver shining,
In fire of battle tried;
The dross of life refining
By action glorified."

The Star of Service finally is dissolved into the Stars and Stripes, significant of the end of the conflict.

Then follows the Gold Star of Sacrifice, while the audience joins in singing:

"O, star of Gold! Immortal!
O, sacrifice supreme!
You shine thro' Heaven's portal
With Star of Bethlehem."

This star dissolves into a blue background, the Star of Bethlehem appears, and the audience sings the last stanza of "The Battle Hymn of the Republic."

The "Liberty Song" is being arranged under the direction of Mrs. Philip North Moore, president of the National Council of Women, an organization seven million strong. The basic idea is to create a wave of patriotic melody that will reach from ocean to ocean.

New Ballad, "When I Come Home to You."

"Smiles" has made such a hit wherever it is heard—and it is sung everywhere—that music lovers will be glad to hear that Mr. J. Will Callahan, the writer of "Smiles," has a new ballad, "When I Come Back to You." This song has been set to music by Frank H. Grey, and the publishers, Huntzinger & Dilworth, are predicting a great future for it.

Questions Answered—Suggestions Offered.

Q. I have a new theatre under my management and the work of gathering together musicians who can play well has been somewhat hard. After getting what I consider a good orchestra together, they refuse to play more than seven hours a day. As you can readily understand, with our show running continuously from 1:30 p. m. to 11 p. m., we must have music. What shall I do?

A. Music is not mechanical and good results cannot be obtained if the players are forced to play for hours at a stretch. No doubt the musicians whom you have secured are Union men and they cannot play more than seven hours without breaking one of the Union rules. Your data is somewhat meager from which to form a basis of advice; but, taking it for granted that the orchestra is a small one, we would suggest that there be a relief pianist or organist employed. He should open the show and play until 2:15 p. m., when the orchestra begins and plays until 5:15. The relief then should carry the supper show until 7 p. m., and the orchestra again take up the burden from 7 to 11 p. m. Moreover, don't make the boys play steadily even when they are in the pit. Give them breathing spells by the interpolation of the organ or piano. This will give you better music.

Q. My cellist refuses to play on a cement floor, claiming that he gets rheumatism. How can I please him?

A. Cement floors are poor sound resonators and much of your beauty of tone is lost because of non-resiliency. Get a false wood flooring laid over the cement, and it will hold your cellist and prove a blessing as a sounding board for your music.

Q. Should I start my music "at screening" or wait until the first scene of the picture?

A. Never allow a foot of film to lack musical accompaniment of some sort.

"Le Roi est Mort, Vive Le Roi," Is a Thought for The Leader

THE King is dead! Long live the King! Kaiser War is finished at last and the Prince of Peace, though long delayed, has come to his own. All the uncertainty and anxiety consequent upon the past unsettled conditions are out of place now and should cease; doubts and fears should no longer harass the mind; and the brightness of the future should be an incentive to greater endeavor everywhere—particularly in the realm of picture music.

The picture industry is here to stay. There can be no doubt about that. Its stability is a guarantee that the field for musicians will not only remain open but will increase in breadth and opportunity. Orchestras will be enlarged; more attention will be paid to the musical portion of picture programs; and the chance for fame and fortune will present itself to those who love their art—whose clearness of vision and industriousness prove paramount.

There is no greater educational medium along this line than the photoplay theatres that feature music. For little money, every one can hear music of some kind. It lies with the musical director whether that music shall be good, bad or indifferent. Poor music will not only kill the opportunity of the leader for advancement but will retard the upward growth of an art that has suffered much and sorely needs cultivation. Too many leaders of mediocre ability have undertaken the work of fitting music to pictures. When their positions have seemed secure, they have lost all ambition to provide something of merit and simply carried out a musical routine—in other words, got into a musical treadmill grind. Over the graves of such the last rites should be solemnly spoken "for the good of the service."

Every leader has a grave responsibility and a momentous mission to perform, the shirking of which will stamp him as a traitor to his fellows and unworthy of the trust which has been imposed upon him.

His technical duties consist of fitting and playing the picture music. For these duties he receives a salary commensurate with the size of his library and the musical ability he displays. The salary provides his livelihood, and the fault rests with himself if his wages are not adequate for his needs.

His moral duty, as a man and a lover of music, is to educate the people to an appreciation of the best classics of this and by-gone days. Beethoven, Bach, Berlioz, Verdi, Liszt, Handel, Tschai-kowsky, Dvorak and the host of musical masters should become readily comprehensible to the audiences through the efforts of the picture player. The prevailing admiration for rag time and "shoo-fly" music should give place to a deep respect for music of a better class. The hearts of the populace should be touched by the grandeur of songs that have stood the test of time, and the symphonic works should become as familiar as folk songs.

Nothing musical is too big for the picture theatre. Symphonies are being played in the larger houses where large orchestras handle the music, and simplified arrangements have been made to meet the requirements of smaller combinations of musicians. The publishers will gladly co-operate with the leaders throughout the country, in order that music shall be raised to a higher standard.

Moreover, the war being over, the European countries will enter into active competition in the presentation of pictures. We have decidedly the big advantage and should retain it at all hazards. There is possible an American School of Music if the efforts of our composers be firmly fostered. But in order to bring this about, the classics must be thoroughly understood and appreciated by the masses. The fundamental principles of good music must form the basis of American art, and from the people of this country must arise a prophet who will lead America into a musical fold all her own.

"The old order changeth." Let it change! Become the instrument that forces the change, but be certain that the change shall be for the better. Regard not your responsibilities lightly lest days of regret become your reward. Put into your work every ounce of energy and every mental effort of which you are capable. Have high ideals and live up to them. Thus, through industry and conscientious devotion to your profession, the joy of service will be yours in the greater musical uplift movement which is sure to be the ultimate result.

"A Life on the Ocean Wave," by Sargent.

The author of this stirring sea song, Epes Sargent, was born in Gloucester, Mass., in September, 1812. Many years of his life were spent in Boston, where he acquired eminence as a journalist and an enviable reputation throughout the country as the writer of much distinctive prose and poetry, and the editor of several fine collections.

Henry Russell, the English composer and baritone singer, came to New York in 1833, and a friendship was established between Mr. Russell and Mr. Sargent that was conducive to a mutual satisfaction. The former gentleman appreciated the literary ability of his friend and requested him to write some verses which could be set to music by himself.

A few days later Mr. Sargent was taking a constitutional along the Battery in New York. As he looked out over the ships and small craft, he evolved the words of "A Life on the Ocean Wave." To quote Mr. Sargent directly: "Having completed my walk and the song together, I went to the office of the 'Mirror,' wrote out the words and showed them to my good friend, George Morris. After reading the piece, he said: My dear boy, this is not a song. It will never do for music, but is a very nice little lyric; so let me take it and publish it in the 'Mirror.'" Mr. Sargent and dismissed the subject from his mind.

Some time later, he chanced to meet Mr. Russell, who reminded him of the promise. Mr. Sargent confessed that he had tried to write a song and had failed. When his friend appeared a bit skeptical, he explained that Mr. Morris had passed adverse judgment. Mr. Russell was not so easily convinced and replied: "Is Morris infallible? Hand me the piece, young man, and let us see what we can make out of your lines."

The two gentlemen went into Hewitt's music store at the corner of Park Place and Broadway. Mr. Russell seated himself at the piano, read over the verses thoughtfully, hummed a bit to himself and then sat seemingly lost in thought. Suddenly, the inspiration came and a melody floated into his brain. He began to hum it, while his body swayed back and forth to the rhythm of the music. Then striking the keys, he launched out into the air. "I have it," he exclaimed, and the work was finished.

From the first, the little song, so optimistic in tone and a bit unique in its character, was very popular. It was sung everywhere and even the street musicians picked it up and could be heard playing it day by day.

In England it was as popular as in this country. Song publishers were not slow in seeing the commercial value involved. They vied with each other in getting out editions of the song. Mr. Sargent says, "A year or two after its publication, I received from England copies of five or six editions that had been issued there by competing publishers."

Of course this popular favor created a market for the song and made it very valuable commercially, yet Mr. Sargent did not receive one cent from it. This statement is so true of practically all creative work of a similar nature that it seems almost superfluous to comment upon it. We have come to accept as granted the unpleasant fact that the person with the inspiration is seldom the one to reap any monetary gain thereby.

"William Tell" a Sensation at the Strand.

The Strand featured "Little Women," presented by Wm. A. Brady, during the week of November 10, and the music that accompanied it was a treat. Those who have read Louisa Alcott's popular novel know the story and will readily understand the difficulties to be encountered in fitting music to the homelike atmosphere.

An elderly lady, sitting close to the writer, exclaimed in sotto-voce: "If the orchestra doesn't stop playing such heavenly music, I'm going to cry,"—and later she wept. No stronger encomium is necessary.

Miss Hoffman sang "Pearl of Brazil," by David, as only she can render such coloratura numbers. The tremendous applause forced her to respond to an encore and she sang "The Last Rose of Summer." There is only one fault with Miss Hoffman's singing—her poor diction; and in her case, it is only a minor weakness.

The Review, Scenic and Comedy were well fitted and excellently played. Better synchrony prevailed and closer attention was given to detail.

The real treat of the evening was the rendition of that old favorite overture, "William Tell." Berlioz characterized it as "a symphony in four parts" and had he been privileged to hear it performed with superb lighting effects, his praise would surely be stronger.

Peacefully the music started with the cello solo and we saw a beautiful back drop showing a sparkling river winding among verdant hills. As the second movement was ushered in, the clouds began to gather, and distant thunder was heard, followed by flashes of lightning. Darker grew the scene, louder the thunder, and fiercer the lightning, until the rain began to fall. First only a few drops; then, as pandemonium broke loose, the heavens seemed to open and torrents of water fell—and applause from the audience). The storm subsided with the music. The rain stopped, the sun peeped out from behind the clouds; amber hues appeared and blue patches of sky were visible. Slowly a rainbow flung its prismatic arch across the scene, (another burst of applause). As the music finished, the river was again reflecting the sparkling sunbeams and all was peacefulness and brightness. The ovation which followed bespoke the appreciation of a large and enthusiastic audience.

Music for "The Cannibals of the South Seas."

Sooner or later every exhibitor who desires to please his patrons will book "Cannibals of The South Seas," produced by Martin Johnson, and released by Robertson & Cole.

It is not an ordinary feature in any sense of the word and it will make a lasting impression upon those fortunate enough to see it.

No mawkish love twaddle mars its mission, nor is there any blood and thunder melodrama to offend the sensitive. Exciting adventures there are in plenty—real man-eating savages in their native haunts, clothed in smiles and beads, are not friendly in their attitude toward the white man. The scenery is beautifully wild and, from the educational standpoint, the picture conveys a thorough knowledge of the customs and conventions of the Solomon Isles.

What about the music for this picture? The question is most natural in view of the unusual atmosphere found in the feature. Oriental music would be out of place; Indian dances would detract from the picture; therefore, nothing must be used that will not hold the wild and weird sense of savagery.

The special musical score prepared by Mr. Beynon for "Cannibals of The South Seas" contains many original compositions hitherto unheard. True to type and intensely atmospheric, they will enhance the picture and enthrall the auditors. Every exhibitor should see that his leader gets the score for there is but little typical Cannibal music to be obtained, and suitable music, unquestionably, means bigger box-office receipts.

A Musician Who Comprehends His Art.

When the screen version of "Salome" was presented at the 44th Street Theatre, New York, the musical score was the work of George M. Rubinstein and this gentleman conducted the orchestra. It became apparent at once that a master craftsman was conducting; a man who had devoted much time, energy and endless research to collecting the material for the musical setting of Oscar Wilde's famous play.

Workers in this field need not be told that the setting for such a picture requires the most careful adjustment, not only from the standpoint of timing and rhythmic flow, but from the atmospheric conditions of the play. The selection of the compositions to be used in a big picture not only needs a wonderful repertoire, but the careful working out of the score requires the hand of genius. Most of the score is original; the remainder is compiled from some of the most famous musical works of times past and modern.

Mr. Rubinstein is now devoting much of his time to the scoring of feature pictures. He also oversees the musical end of the Fox activities, which means controlling music and musicians in some twenty large theatres.

Mr. Rubinstein is very popular among musicians and has long been actively engaged in musical work. He is a master of the clarinet as well as an orchestra man of long experience. This especially fits him for his new work.

Not the least item in Mr. Rubinstein's prominence in the field of musical work, is the fact that every film he has scored has been a success. The list includes some of the most famous productions of the present time. Among them are "Cleopatra," "Les Miserables," "Revelation," "The Spy," "The Conqueror," "Jack and the Beanstalk," and the "Wives of Men." Nothing succeeds like success, and earnest work, coupled to a gift for scoring pictures, have made Mr. Rubenstein successful.

It was at the Rialto-Rivoli Theatres that Mr. Rubinstein, as an assistant conductor, became known as a picture expert.

Ever since the opening of these two houses, Mr. Rubinstein had been connected with the musical forces, both as a conductor and an arranger. The music critic of the Dramatic Mirror had this to say about his work last season: "A shining example of how to accompany a picture was given at the Rivoli last week, when the Drew Comedy was shown. I was quite astonished at the care for detail in the orchestra. Mr. Rubinstein was conducting when I saw this picture. Here was an excellent chance to see varying tempo carried out. It worked. The music followed the action instead of being held down to quarters and halves, measures and bars. While this accompaniment was for a comedy, yet the principle is just the same for a more serious picture." Mr. Beynon of the Moving Picture World paid a high compliment to Mr. Rubinstein's scoring of "Salome." He said: "William Fox is presenting his biblical drama, "Salome," at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre, accompanied by an orchestra of twenty-four musicians directed by George M. Rubinstein. Mr. Rubinstein arranged the score, and we can conscientiously say that it ranks with the best in all points, and sets a new standard in some."

Aside from Mr. Rubinstein's fine mental equipment, he possesses a fine library. This music has been accumulating for many years and covers the whole range of musical expression. It is ideally catalogued for the motion picture worker. Everything is ready for the scoring of a most complex picture at a moment's notice. The library contains also much that is original with Mr. Rubinstein, scored and ready for use. He realizes the importance of the practical application of music to pictures, and his scores bear none of the ear-marks of the amateur. His advent into the wider musical activities, which he has recently taken up, is a distinct addition to that world which has for its purpose the ideal presentation of the motion picture.

Original Musical Contests Encouraged.

Musical originality is being encouraged and developed at all of the training camps. There are "Song Contests," in which the various regiments compete for prizes offered by public-spirited citizens. In some of these "Songfests" wonderfully good original songs have been sung for the first time by their composers. A few of them are parodies like the Camp Devon gem, "Where Do We Go from Ayer, Boys?" and many similar ditties, but others are wholly original, both words and music.

According to Major General Leonard Wood, as a tonic for fatigue and depression, music has no competitor in army life. "It is just as essential," he says, "for soldiers to know how to sing as it is for them to carry rifles and learn how to shoot them."

Our boys are singing. A singing army is invincible.

Gaskill Sends Lyrics from the Front.

Clarence Gaskill, who has written some very popular songs in the last year or so, is just doing his bit with the rest of our boys in the trenches. He is attached to the 311th Machine Gun Battalion, but in the midst of his strange surroundings he finds time to write a song.

From "Somewhere in France" he sent the song to Witmark & Sons, writing: "I think you can see the possibilities for a nice little song, hence I am submitting my attempt at it. The boys seem to like it and sing it a whole lot."

Its title is alluring: "As You Were When I First Met You, That's How I Want You Today." There is a simple, catchy little melody and a charming story told. It is not a war song, but just a singable ballad that all the world will want to sing. M. Witmark & Sons are enthusiastic over it and predict that it will develop into a tremendous success.

Rialto Theatre Loses Belgian Cellist.

Gaston Dubois, the Belgian Cellist, whose remarkable virtuosity has evoked praise from many of the prominent music critics, has severed his connection with the Rialto orchestra to accept a position in the first chair of the Philharmonic orchestra. Mr. Dubois has won many friends among the orchestra men and it is with a sense of deep regret that the musical director, Hugo Riesenfeld, releases him.

The Dulcimer Changed to the Tympanon.

All of the few collections of early musical instruments include the dulcimer. In the collection at the Conservatoire in Paris, there is a beautifully decorated instrument of the time of King Louis XIV which is described as a "dulcimer or tympanon; ornamented with roses; carved in wood; the case of which is gilded and set with paintings."

Nevertheless, in that brilliant period of France, the dulcimer had already fallen into disfavor. It had been popular in the boudoir and in the salon, but music as an art, and a science, was rapidly developing, demanding more extended powers than could be provided by the dulcimer. Newer forms of instruments had come into vogue, so that by the early part of the XVII century, the dulcimer, which poets and painters had immortalized, became the companion of wanderers, and was to be heard chiefly in the village taverns.

But for the connoisseurs, it still retained its charms. Pantaleon Hebenstreit, a well known musician of Leipsig, was responsible for its restoration to fashionable favor late in the same century. It was he who first invented the wooden hammer, covered with leather, which which the dulcimer (very shortly thereafter rechristened and called the tympanon) was rehabilitated. It became very popular at the court of Louis XIV.

Hebenstreit created a Court sensation by his playing of the tympanon, and it was not long before manufacturers sought to introduce the hammer stroke into the mechanism of the piano. It was the great French Monach who renamed this instrument. He had a Royal Tympanon made, which, upon the occasion of the marriage of the musician to a beautiful Maid of Honor, was presented to Hebenstreit. His famous descendant, Sacha Votichenko, brought this instrument from its repose in Russia and introduced it to the European world and to America.

Harry Bataille, the distinguished French dramatist and critic, has compared the tympanon to "a little casket in which are enclosed popular melodies, old songs and dances, of antique charms—delicious and soul-stirring"—while Tolstoi, who heard it a few months before his death, likened its tone picturesquely to "the far-away echo of the voices of the bards of old."

Seasonable Song Composed by Caro Roma.

Anticipating the sure approach of peace, M. Witmark & Sons have issued a song which they have had in preparation for some time. It bears the title, "Ring Out, Sweet Bells of Peace!" and is one of the most satisfying and beautiful songs of its type. The lyrics are by Wm. H. Gardner, and the music by Caro Roma, who were jointly responsible for that remarkable Southern song success, "Can't Yo' Heah Me Callin', Caroline?" The new peace song meets every requirement—it is imbued with the spirit of thankfulness, and simple and easy to sing. Also the music is melodious and appropriate to a degree. "Ring Out, Sweet Bells of Peace!" is a song that will live long after the dawn of Peace has passed; and it is particularly good for use at Christmas.

Carli D. Ellnor, Musician and Patriot.

As an example of true patriotism, it is interesting to learn that Carli D. Ellnor, who is considered the most successful creator of musical scores for moving pictures, is now over seas with the 157th Ambulance Company, 115th Sanitary Train, 40th Division, A. E. F., which recruited at Camp Kearney, California.

Mr. Ellnor has to his credit the musical scores of "The Eyes of the World," "Ramona," and the present Griffith success of "Hearts of the World." Several smaller productions bear his autograph as well, but the three mentioned above, all of which are remembered for their musical attainments, deserve special mention.

With the good news of peace, it is earnestly hoped that in a few months we will find him arranging scores for future motion picture productions. In this field he made ten thousand dollars a year, but was willing and anxious to forego it for democracy's sake. A Roumanian by birth, but an American by adoption, he lost no time in getting "Over there" to do his bit.

Influence of Music Upon the Soldiers.

Biased by tradition, many people are inclined to think of music as a luxury to be foregone in wartime. In the first official book of life in American Training Centers, the authors point out that music—especially singing—plays a large part in the Government's program for preparing men to fight.

The book is called "Keeping Our Fighters Fit—For War and After." It was written by Edward Frank Allen with the co-operation of Raymond B. Fosdick, Chairman of the War and Navy Commissions on Training Camp Activities. Although authoritative, it sparkles with human-interest anecdotes, and is very readable and entertaining.

In the chapter entitled, "The Fighters that sent them into the fray united in purpose and dauntless in will.

What the men sing is a matter of less importance to the Commission than the fact that they sing.

The bulk of the songs is nothing classical; sometimes they are inclined toward the rough-house; and yet one day, in a Southern camp a group of thousands of men—almost a whole division—were heard singing:

"Mine eyes have seen the glory
Of the coming of the Lord;
He is trampling out the vintage
Where the grapes of wrath are stored."

No misgivings need be felt as to the wholesomeness of the sentiments of these singing fighters.

Conservatory of Music for Bandmasters.

A summer school of band music for men in war service has been established at the New England Conservatory of Music.

This school, the first of its kind in the United States, is designed for men already in the service who have been recommended for intensive training. Its classes continued until the reopening of the Conservatory on September 19. During the regular sessions of the institution, it is intended to conduct classes for young men aiming to qualify for this branch of the national service.

At the beginning of the past summer, the New England Conservatory offered to the respective commanders of the first naval district and of the Department of the East the facilities of the school for such further training of their band leaders as they might desire. The offer was favorably received, for it is well understood that there are details of instruction in band work which can be presented in a regularly organized music school, and which it is not always possible for band leaders and their men to obtain in their more or less separated units. As the nearest Government school for training of naval bands is at Newport, Rhode Island, and as there is no school under army approval east of New York, it seemed to be especially desirable that opportunities of this kind should be provided in Boston.

The details of this instruction for army musicians are, at this writing, under consideration of the authorities of the Northeastern Department. The training of the navy men was begun in July with about 70 musicians in attendance from the naval stations and the radio and aviation schools at Cambridge.

Instruction in all the usual band instruments is given by members of the New England Conservatory faculty who are available for summer instruction and by several eminent professional musicians from outside the school.

General direction of the teaching is in the hands of Samislao Gallo, of Boston, who is widely recognized as an authority on band scoring. Mr. Gallo received much of his musical education in the New England Conservatory orchestra and in the composition classes conducted by George W. Chadwick, director of the Conservatory, who has taken great interest in the technical aspects of popular and military band music.

The co-operation of America's oldest and best-equipped music school in this form of war work was arranged by General Manager Ralph L. Flanders, in accordance with a plan that grew out of the services rendered last winter by Wallace Goodrich, dean of the faculty, who is a member of the National Committee on Army and Navy Camp Music and chairman of its sub-committee on bands. He is now acting as an advisor on military music for the War Department Commission on Training Camp Activities.

Who Sing," the author says: "Patriotism is no hollow, empty thing. It wins battles. And the music, be it instrumental or vocal, that awakens or feeds it, is scarcely less potent than high explosives."

"Singing has long been recognized as an aid to efficiency, but it remained for the Commissioner of Training Camp Activities to develop it in the army and navy with that end in view."

In speaking of the value of music in arousing the fighting spirit, Mr. Allen points out that although "authorities do not lay stress upon it in military textbooks, they talk a good deal about morale and esprit de corps on both of which singing has powerful influence."

"O Jerry, give us Joan of Arc," shouted one of the blue-jackets. So they sang 'Joan of Arc' with a strong, patriotic thrill in the line, 'Come, lead your France to victory,' and when they reached 'We'll hang Kaiser Bill to a sour apple tree,' and the refrain of 'Glory, Glory, Hallelujah,' the very rafters vibrated in sympathy."

The boys were having lots of fun, of course, but the spirit that the music was bringing out of their souls is the force

Lest "Chickens Come Home to Roost" Let Cue Sheets Be Properly Prepared

At last, the producer is alive to the value of properly prepared cue sheets, and scents the danger in those that are not the work of competent musicians and put out in a manner acceptable to the average leader. This fact is a source of infinite satisfaction to musicians who have for years patiently devoted themselves to missionary efforts in the picture playing profession, knowing that the time would surely come when the importance of music would be appreciated and honest and conscientious endeavors receive their reward.

The film magnate is now strongly convinced that good music will put his picture over and that poor music will ruin the work of priceless months. He is beginning to ask questions—a very hopeful sign. Real music service will be the result if a thorough investigation is begun. The average business man knows but little of music values, but once convince him that it is "good business" and the musician has won out.

Monetary remuneration should not be considered as of paramount importance by either the producer or arranger. Every laborer is worthy of his hire; but money should not be discussed except as a secondary consideration, dependent upon the expertness and ability of the arranger, coupled with the length of the picture and the necessary time it takes to prepare a good cue sheet. Technical work of this kind can be bought at practically any price, and the result obtained will always reflect the amount paid. Cheap opinions will convey poor suggestions; and, unfortunately, some of the more unscrupulous musicians will charge a high figure for mediocre cue sheets, because they are trading upon the musical ignorance of their employer and they feel safe. That much-abused ignorance is fast disappearing, we are glad to state, and with it will go the bluffers, the panhandlers, and those who use their positions to exploit their own wares, thus abusing the trust imposed upon them.

Recently, we were informed through the columns of the musical department of an esteemed contemporary, greatly to our edification, that there were but two men capable of preparing cue sheets. It was solemnly stated, with many recriminations upon the heads of all "claiming to be musical film experts," and an urgent call was sent out for the elimination of "these pseudo-professional music cue sheets." Absurdly funny in its puerile attempt to corner the market on cue sheets, the article will do more to throw confusion into a situation that now bids fair to bear fruit, than all the poor attempts to cue pictures. The leader knows and appreciates the defects of a poor cue sheet and has complained to the proper authorities and, as has already been stated, the producer begins to see the matter from the leader's standpoint.

There are many excellent musicians arranging cue sheets in a conscientious manner and they are meeting with more or less success. There are also some who use it as a means of publicity, while the worst offenders are those men who are subsidized by, or hold an interest in, a music publishing firm.

Bad form also has had much to do with the inefficiency of cue sheets. The arranger may possibly have had an excellent idea of the musical requirements of the picture and probably prepared a fine lot of musical suggestions that, from the standpoint of their suitability, would play the picture. But the printed form in no way indicated it and looked like a page of Egyptian hieroglyphics, and was about as intelligible to the leader.

In a previous article we have gone into the subject at length; but for the benefit of the producer, the exhibitor and some leaders, we shall try to explain in a few words the requisite qualities for a perfectly prepared cue sheet. Our personal opinion will play no part in the explanation which is based upon hundreds of letters from all over the country, expressing the needs of the leader in an orchestra playing pictures.

After the name of the picture, the number of reels and the releasing company have been indicated, the cue sheet begins. First, there must be the cue to start the music. These cues may be subtitles, descriptions of actions, or inserts, but they must be clearly defined in any case. They should be printed in large or bold type so that the leader can read them in the half light of the pit when the house is dark.

Next should come the duration of the scene started by the cue, in minutes and fractions of minutes. These should also be plainly indicated. It is useless to attempt to time a scene to the exact second, for music is elastic and two measures will easily account for anything up to fifteen seconds. Thus minutes, their quarters, halves and three-quarters are ample indications for the leader. The time may be placed at the right, the left or below the cue, but must be printed in a comprehensible form and must not prove an arithmetical problem in subtraction.

Following this placing of the time comes the suggested number, which should be followed by the name of the composer. Some cue sheets contain no mention of the author responsible for the music but take particular pains to indicate the music publisher. The clever idea back of it all is apparent, but why should the producer advertise the publisher? The printing of the musical suggestion may be in small type if necessary, for, after the leader has fitted his picture and the musical setting has been arranged in rotation, he has no further need for that portion of the cue sheet.

The tempo of the music suggested is most important, for it provides the leader with an alternative. If for any reason, he cannot play the music suggested upon the cue sheet, he may select something else of the same tempo and character that will fit equally well. This may be placed under the musical number for convenience.

Thus we have five essentials in the properly prepared cue sheet form, the Cue.	Music Suggested.	Composer.

T. TILLY TOLD TOM.	Cavatina.....	Bohm
4 minutes	Moderato

cue, the time duration, musical suggestion, its composer, and its tempo. Its very simplicity proves its effectiveness.

The proper qualifications of a musical arranger must be ascertained by the producer. The said arranger must be capable of fitting each and every scene with due regard for atmosphere, screen action, and plot gradation. He must have had practical experience in fitting and playing for pictures in a theatre. He should have a large library of all the available material suitable for pictures, produced from all possible sources, which should be properly classified and catalogued. He should never suggest a number about which he is in doubt and by no means indicate a number which must be repeated many times to fill out a long scene.

Above all, the film companies should check up the music noted in the cue sheet and see to it that no particular music firm predominates in that column. Music publishers have their own peculiar field of operation and should play no part in arranging cue sheets for films. The temptation invariably proves too great, no matter how conscientiously they may embark upon the enterprise, and results in a tearing down of the woven fabric of which good music is the wool and the picture is the warp.

Sooner or later greed and selfishness defeats itself. The time comes when the motives which actuate actions are understood and appreciated by every one. It does not take long, however, even when men are as busy as the average producer, for a realization that cue sheets which continually mention only six or eight composers have behind the seeming madness, a well-schemed-out method. When the method is comprehended and the producer learns that he is not getting the service for which he is paying and which he has a right to expect, he will become disgusted, discontinue the service, and the avaricious and unprofessional musician will find the old adage verified.

"Tenting on the Old Camp Ground."

The majority of patriotic songs have been born or manufactured outright because of an intense love of country and an inspired desire for service. There are a few, however, of these national songs, which are better left unsung when an appeal must be made to heroic effort, for the effect of the lyrics on the mind is depressing rather than stimulating. Among these, and ranking in the same class, are "Just Before the Battle, Mother," by Dr. Root, and "Tenting on the Old Camp Ground," by Walter Kittredge. During the Civil War, both these songs had such a tendency toward lowering the spirits of the army and causing a depression so fatal to the soldier on the eve of battle, that the troops were discouraged from singing either, and frequently the regimental bands were ordered to refrain from playing the music associated with them.

Born of poor parents on a farm near Merrimac, New Hampshire, in 1832, the tenth of eleven children, the advantages for study accorded to Walter Kittredge were, as can readily be understood, notably few. His education embraced what he could learn by observation and diligent application to study in the common school near his home. As to music—he never had a teacher in the art, but at a remarkably early age displayed unusual talent. He says: "My father bought one of the first Seraphines made in Concord, and well do I remember when the man came to put it up. To hear him play a simple melody was a great treat, and this event was an important epoch in my child world." This little harmonium coming into the home when the lad was daily growing into a greater appreciation of the art which it interpreted, completely changed the outlook on life for the music-starved boy.

A musical instrument upon which to play and work out his compositions gave the lad an impetus and an inspiration that colored his whole existence. When he was but twenty years old—at the age when most boys are in college—he began giving ballad concerts by himself, and a bit later joined forces with Joshua Hutchinson in the same professional work.

In the first year of the Civil War, Mr. Kittredge published a small Union song book. Shortly afterward he was drafted into the army. But while making his preparations to leave for the front he found time to write "Tenting on the Old Camp Ground." Both the words and music are his own composition.

This little poem was in good company, for, like many other and more ambitious forms of literature, it was at first unappreciated and refused publication. But Mr. Kittredge was not easily discouraged. He sang it in public, putting into his voice all the pathos which had inspired him to write the lines. As he had hoped, a remarkable and spontaneous popularity resulted. A certain Boston publishing concern was not slow to see the possibilities of the song and engaged someone to write one with a similar title. History fails to state why it did not obtain the original from Mr. Kittredge—but that it did not do so meant a bit of good fortune for the Messrs. Ditson, another publishing firm in Boston, who availed themselves of that privilege and showed their business acumen thereby. The song was in great demand everywhere and the sales exceeded even the brightest expectations of the author and the publishers, being enormous.

This little song differed materially in essential quality from the grand rank and file of war songs so contagious and popular at the period in which it was written. It did not express a warlike sentiment in a single line, but breathed a spirit of sorrow over the sacrifice of life and the suffering consequent upon the conflict. The thought conveyed found an echo in scores of American heart, worn out, depressed and well nigh discouraged over the battling between brothers and the breaking up of erstwhile peaceful homes by internal dissension and strife. The music possessed the characteristic rhythm of a negro melody which lifted the words a bit from the melancholy tone which they alone expressed, and pleased and charmed by the very simplicity of the composition.

Victor Schertzinger an Ince Director.

From a musical career as soloist, director and composer Mr. Schertzinger laid down the bow, baton and pen to use the megaphone. The productions which have appeared under his direction forcefully substantiate his contention that the eye is as susceptible to the delights of rhythm, harmony and the poetry of motion, as the ear.

Public and critics alike have accorded to Mr. Schertzinger's pictures a pleasing individuality, and he generously credits this to his musical instinct. What is now being realized by the public was foreseen by the keen vision of Thomas H. Ince, the master producer. Appreciating the importance of musical settings for pictures, he engaged Mr. Schertzinger to write scores for Triangle productions, then under Mr. Ince's supervision. Thirty-one of these were written by the man who provided the song hits in "Tik Tok Man" and Kitty Gordon's "Pretty Mrs. Smith." Then Mr. Ince assigned him to the work of writing music for "Civilization." It was decided as a novelty to present this great spectacle with a pantomime prologue with living actors. As Mr. Schertzinger wrote the music for this he was asked to direct the prologue that the action might fit in perfectly with the music. So successfully did Mr. Schertzinger suit the action to the rules of music, making a superb impressive scenes, that Mr. Ince at once saw a new development in screen story telling and offered Mr. Schertzinger one of his directorships.

"The photo-play, which has become distinctive art," said Mr. Schertzinger in commenting on his work, "is developed much along the same lines as a musical composition. The composer is given inspiration for his music by some theme, and in the developing of this he conveys to the ear of the listener an impression of his own mental picture. So it is with the photo-play. The director receives from the scenario writer a story written about a theme. It then devolves upon him to visualize this for the human eye. The methods of development are practically the same—the tools of expression are different. The composer must use the variations of tone, the divisions of time, the modulations of volume, the crescendo, the diminuendo, etc. The director has at his command the diversity of scenery, the various modes of expression in living beings, the effects of lights, the contrasting of locations and character, etc. But in the picture as in music there must be harmony. The character must fit into the proper atmosphere; the settings must suit the period in which the story is being developed; the players must conform to the lives they portray. The poetry of motion plays no small part. Every scene may be perfect in detail, but if the scenes are not arranged with care there will be a discord as acute to the eye as is the mis-striking of piano keys to the ear. One might well call this a matter of tempo. If the musical director does not maintain his tempo, the musician is well aware of the result; if the same principle is not applied by the photo-play director, he gets a 'jumpy' picture.

"There is unquestionably a great kin between the musical composition and the photo-play. The one is poetry to the ear, the other to the eye. My knowledge of music, I am sure, is responsible for whatever success the public may be kind enough to accord the productions I have directed."

Before entering the picture profession, Mr. Schertzinger had a notable and enviable career as a musician. When but seven years old he was featured by the symphony orchestra of Philadelphia, his own home town, as "the boy prodigy violinist." After studying with numerous instructors in this country he went abroad, and for three years was under the tutelage of Brussel's masters. He was then featured as soloist with the bands of both Sousa and Prior. He became musical director for Oliver Morosco and then attracted attention as composer. Hits in "The Tik Tok Man" and "Pretty Mrs. Smith" were due to his genius. Then in a vaudeville tour he demonstrated his versatility by proving himself a master of both piano and violin. He also plays the cello and practically any string instrument one may place in his hands.

Under the supervision of Thomas H. Ince he has directed photo-plays featuring Charles Ray, Dorothy Dalton and Enid Bennett.

Devotion of Picture Player to the Art.

Having always maintained that the picture playing profession is a dignified art and that musicians are awakening to an appreciation of its possibilities, it was with much pleasure that we had our convictions sustained in a letter from a picture theatre organist of a western city. We are quoting in part from this letter, believing it will be an inspiration to other musicians in this field:

"I am most anxious to obtain a position near New York where I can continue in my study of the organ, harmony and counter point. My organ experience has been confined to work on a three manual 'Moller.'"

"I am an earnest worker and am not satisfied with the results I am getting and probably never shall be. I want a better opportunity to study and advance than this city affords me. But I do not want a position where I can simply get by and grind out my salary, but where I can study three hours a day on the organ and piano. I want an organ teacher who has had legitimate knowledge combined with picture experience."

It is people with the above spirit who are taking away the obloquy formerly attached to motion picture playing, and who are placing the profession on a plane where only the best instrumentalists can hope to obtain positions in this field.

Three New Puccini Operas Presented.

Lovers of Puccini music will be glad to know that his three latest one-act operas will be heard for the first time on any stage at the Metropolitan Opera House, on Saturday night, December 14th. "Il Tabarro" is a tragedy; "Suor Angelica," a mystery play; and "Gianni Schicchi" is described as a "side-splitting farce." Moranzoni will conduct all three operas. Such a diversity of operatic music is especially welcome at this time when the war has relegated the German music to the background.

Cannibal Music at the Hotel Astor.

It seems almost impossible to conceive that pictures have already arrived at the dignity compatible with the atmosphere of the Hotel Astor. But November 19 will go on the pages of the history of filmdom as the date when a specially invited audience viewed "The Cannibals of the South Seas," presented by Robertson & Cole, in the ballroom of that famous hostelry.

In the proper presentation of this picture, the music plays a very important role, as it must be atmospheric, and there is so little music written that is adaptable to cannibals on their native heath. But, judging from the many flattering comments made by people who were entirely disinterested, the musical score prepared by Mr. Beynon was equal to the exigencies of the occasion.

The overture chosen was "The Red Man," from the Sousa suite, "Dwellers in the Western World." It at once warded the audience away from Broadway and prepared them for the adventures of the evening.

As Mr. and Mrs. Johnson, who filmed the picture, embarked on their long journey it was an undecided question just where they would land. The orchestra accentuated that fact by playing "Where Do We Go from Here."

When the boat was leaving Honolulu, where the party stopped en route, the music was distinctively characteristic and very appropriate, being "Aloha Oe," known as the Honolulu farewell song. Also in the Samoan Islands, the "Dance of the Swans" fitted the scenes admirably.

Mr. and Mrs. Johnson landed at Sydney, Australia, to do a bit of shopping for their savage friends. The national anthem, "The Song of Australia," a stately number, was greatly appreciated by the audience, particularly by the many British subjects who were present.

As the boat again wended its way toward the Solomon Islands, it glided over the placid ocean to the strains of "Luana," a dreamy number which was the embodiment of peace.

While the scenes were shifting from one island to another in this remarkable picture, the music became more weird and touched up the views like a brush in the hand of a master artist.

Many of the selections used were original ones, several of them being the compositions of Mr. Beynon. One of these, the "Cannibal Lament," was used for the mourners in the burial scene, and it breathed the spirit of the Cannibal who suffers as an animal suffers, but not as one whose soul is awakened to fullness of life. The "War Dance," composed by Mr. William C. Stickles especially for the occasion, was very effective, and so realistic that the audience swayed with the rhythmic flow of the music, which was in perfect synchrony with the gyrations of the dancers.

The population is rapidly dying off in some of these islands. And a picture was shown where a census was being taken. As the people filed along in the most dejected procession ever seen outside of a cemetery, the music "Indian Wail," by Dvorak, was singularly appropriate and impressive.

Throughout the evening the musicians labored under gigantic difficulties. As one of them remarked: "I have been an orchestra man for thirty years and have never played such difficult music." There was one singularly unique feature about this music. It is seldom that the oboe has the stellar position on the musical program for an entire evening. But this score almost continually required the weird and uncanny wail which the oboe alone could emit. Near the end of the picture, the orchestra began to show the effects of the terrific strain put upon them and the music fell off a bit in quality. But the audience was keenly alive to the situation and appreciated the splendid work that had been done.

This picture is only the first of a series of presentations which will be given by Messrs. Robertson & Cole. Many very prominent screen stars will be presented in a spectacular way in pre-releases.

Questions Answered—Suggestions Offered.

Q. Can you give me some information regarding a place where I can obtain a clavier? I wish to practice several hours daily and feel the need of one.

A. Mrs. A. M. Virgil, 11 West Sixty-eighth street, New York City, is an authority on the clavier and its use. She will be able, we feel sure, to give you any information you may desire, if you will communicate with her.

Q. I wish to obtain orchestrations of the dances in "Prince Igor," and selections from several of the most noted grand operas. Will you tell me how to obtain of Murger's La Vie Boheme, which depicts life in the Quartier Latin in 1830. The principal characters in Puccini's delightful opera are the inseparable quartette described by Murger, who with equal cheerfulness defy the pangs of hunger and the landlord of their little garret. Into the scenes of careless gaiety is interwoven a touch of pathos, and the music is in turn lively and tender, with a haunting sweetness that is most fascinating.

The Strand Topical Review received the usual accompaniment of marches and two-steps. These are always played too fast for the fastidious taste of a musician, but no doubt add "pep" to the performance.

Yon Collignon, a baritone of mediocre ability, sang Oley Speak's "When the Boys Come Home." At this time the song has a strong appeal and should receive rounds of applause upon its merits, but the poor diction and enunciation of the singer detracted from its worth. To make up for this deficiency, scenes showing transports laden with returning soldiers were projected while the singer was dimly outlined in a spot light. Also there was depicted the returned sailors on parade, with a hint of the big peace celebration to come.

This is the first time we have seen pictures accompanying the voice and the audience showed their appreciation of the novelty in an unmistakable manner. It only goes to prove that music and pictures are so closely allied in principle that either may accompany the other and be most interesting in any case.

Billie Burke in "The Make Believe Wife," a Paramount feature, was her usual vivacious self. The music was very well fitted. Special mention might be made of the banjo effect in perfect synchrony with the hand movement of Miss Burke as she strums upon the instrument. In fact, the synchronous part of the piece was more than usually well done. No one has a monopoly upon synchrony, and the Strand orchestra is daily becoming more proficient in this phase of the art of fitting pictures. All that remains is the perfecting of the Review music.

The entire performance ran largely to Grand Opera, the fifth act from "Faust" being sung in its entirety, and the organ closing with "Il Travatore." The "Faust" number was sung by Alys Michot as Marguerita, Ralph Erolle as Faust and the Mephistopheles role was taken by Mr. Collignon. It was done in costume with the proper setting.

The opening duet was splendid, both voices showing off to excellent advantage. The following recitatives were clearly enunciated and the plot well worked up for the entrance of the Devil. Mr. Collignon tried hard, but he is not and never could be a Mephistopheles. His lower tones are lost in the trio and his portly figure conveys the idea that he must be a jolly Devil and incapable of separating two such fond lovers as Marguerita and Faust.

The acting was well done and the climax intensely dramatic and well-timed. Mr. Reiser conducted with a keen appreciation of the requisite volume of accompaniment. During the trio, which is heavily scored, there is a temptation to "pull out all the stops," but Mr. Reiser suitably graded his volume to that of the voices. These excerpts from Grand Opera are much liked and do splendid missionary work in educating the people to the higher standards of music.

After a scenic and cartoon, Ralph H. Brigham, the noted organist, played Selections from "Il Travatore." Mr. Brigham is at home in music of this class and made a good impression.

Animated Songs at the Strand Theatre.

For the week of November 17 the Strand offered a musical program that was exceptional for its attention to detail.

The overture, "Selections from La Boheme," conducted by Carl Edouarde, revealed the possibilities of this kind of music as a form of entertainment in picture theatres. Although its familiarity makes it popular, yet a poor rendition or a deviation from the traditional trend will mar its effectiveness. Mr. Edouarde sensibly stuck to the usual interpretation and the overture made a decided sensation through his careful handling.

Close Attention to Small Details Makes for Stronger Picture Presentation

LOOKING backward over the road traveled by the art of picture playing, we are surprised many times by the seeming indifference to detail which prevailed in the earlier days. We can hardly understand in our present enlightenment why we so foolishly fitted a valse to scenes showing Cairo and its Egyptian splendor. It seems impossible that we used "Hearts and Flowers" for every grievous movement in film-land, yet such was the case. Agitation of mind, matter or morals invariably called forth Agitato No. 1 from the top shelf of the library; speed of any kind was portrayed by the use of a hurry. We don't deny it, for only by our mistakes can we learn.

The rapid advancement in the profession of fitting the features has made careful discrimination an important factor in the portrayal of picture emotions. The general trend of photoplay plots are only held in mind in order that the musical setting may be closer knit together after the details have been considered.

Points arise regarding atmosphere, variety, tempi, and color that call for argument and accurate decision. No longer do we hear from the lips of good leaders the expression "good enough for our audience." "Does it fit the scene in every particular?" That is the paramount question. If it does, the audience will surely be pleased.

As long as the world lasts, dancing will play its part in the entertainment of the populace. The graceful undulations of the body to a rhythmic melody satisfies the fastidious fancies of eye and ear, if both be synchronously performed. Many dancing scenes occur in pictures and as there are diverse forms of the terpsichorean art, the music for the accompaniment must be carefully chosen. Should the dance be a Grecian classic, Apache music would never convey the proper rhythm—yet it has been attempted, either through ignorance or negligence—and vice versa, an Apache dance would be incongruous with any other music than that written for it. Spanish dances must have habanera style and a waltz will not fit a scene where people are fox-trotting. These may seem "mere details," but it is the attention to "mere details" that makes for proper presentation.

In the fitting of scenes depicting grief, "the old order changeth." There are degrees of sorrow, ranging from the sadness of a child who has lost her candy, to the anguish of a mother bereft of her only son. It seems hardly necessary to caution musical directors against the use of Godards' "Adagio Pathetique" to fit the former, but it has been done. In analyzing the situation, the only reason seems to have been the fondness of the musician for the piece and the fact that it seemed suitable for grief. Had he used it for the other instance, there might have been less censure, but still it would fall short of the mark of precise picture fitting. It is much too serious for the child and not "wailing" enough for the mother.

An arranger must be able to visualize himself in the emotion of sorrow to the degree depicted in the scene. When he feels as the actor feels, he will know the music that describes his sensation. Human nature is largely the same in the case of elemental emotions and what he gives forth will naturally be accepted by his auditors in the same spirit and to the same degree. This holds true not only in the emotion of sorrow, but in all primary emotions.

Atmospheric pictures call for much discrimination in their music selection. Heretofore, much Chinese music has been used for scenes or actions occurring in Japan. No longer is this permissible for the patrons know the difference. Many compositions written by those who have never studied the Chinese music, are used to convey atmosphere. If possible, it is wise to abstain from using anything that is not authentic or correct in its melody and harmonization.

Oriental music as a large class might be used in adapting situations found in New Hebrides, but, if care for detail be observed, search should be made for something less Eastern and more wierd. It is by no means splitting hairs to say that East Indian and American Indian music is entirely different in form and rhythm, yet it is difficult to scientifically explain those differences. Nevertheless, our ear is our guide and to set scenes in Bombay with "From an Indian Lodge" by MacDonald would result in a confusion of ideas in the minds of the "paid admissions."

Surface fitting is no longer tolerated by the educated picture fans, and the musicians must take more pains, give greater thought, and scrutinize more closely than ever before. Given a scene to portray, he must first determine its relation to those foregone. He must decide what dominant emotion prevails and fix the degree of that emotion by mental concentration and visualization. The atmosphere of "location" must be maintained at all times, lest through poor perspection he carry his people out of France and land them somewhere in Russia, among the Bolsheviks.

Pictures can no longer be fitted in a "general way" with good results, and the musical director who takes his work seriously readily understands the significance of close attention to detail.

Rialto Sets New Musical Standard.

We all have wished for riches; the reasons for our longing being manifold. Some want wealth to protect them from work, while others see all around them opportunities to lighten the load of their fellowmen. Our personal and particular reason for desiring money at this moment—and for the time being—is prompted by truly altruistic motives. We would like to invite and bring every exhibitor in America and his musical director to see and hear the Rialto performance of this week.

There is not a weak spot in the entire bill and the musical presentation is superb. The "Sixth Hungarian Rhapsody" by Liszt furnishes a wonderful overture. Conducted by Hugo Riesenfeld with the famous Bela Nyary playing the Czimbalom, no better rendition has ever been offered to the music loving public. The Rialto Symphony Orchestra is always at its best in works which call forth nuances of peculiar timbre.

Gladys Rice, soprano, sang in costume "Till I Wake," one of the well-known Indian Love Lyrics by Amy Woodford-Finden. It was pleasing. The orchestra was not restrained enough in volume and frequently overshadowed the singer.

Two important words in the musical lexicon of picture playing signify the success of the accompaniment used for the pictorial—Synchrony and Suitability. Mr. Rothapfel does not believe in playing the entire review by means of marches, and his staff of arrangers have given him many old and well-known songs, the significance of which is strong. He used "Billy Magee, McGaw," "The Soldier's Farewell," "The Stein Song" and "Land of Hope and Glory" by Elgar. Thus variety of color is maintained with additional piquancy.

Mr. Riesenfeld came back to conduct the "Credo" from "Otello" sung by Vincente Ballester. We know the aria well and have frequently heard it sung by eminent baritones under the baton of famous maestros, but never have we heard a rendition which excelled that offered at the Rialto. Mr. Ballester has a good voice, splendid appearance and knows what he is singing about. Not only that, but his portrayal of the part was conveyed unmistakably to his auditors. Mr. Riesenfeld was at home in the score and seemed to take keen enjoyment from his meritorious work.

The feature as usual received a carefully thought-out setting and the synchrony was perfect. From week to week, the theatres presided over by Mr. Rothapfel provide a standard form of entertainment unsurpassed anywhere in the country, and every producer, exchange manager, exhibitor and musical director should make it a point to visit these "temples of the motion picture."

"Rock Me to Sleep" Womanly in Tone.

"Backward, turn backward,
O, Time in your flight,
Make me a child again;
Just for to-night."

There comes a time in the life of each individual when cares and responsibilities assume such gigantic proportions that the weakness of the flesh becomes greater than the strength of the spirit. Then we long to shift the burden of life elsewhere, and the heart subconsciously echoes the sentiments of the above verse.

It chances that but a few of our characteristically American songs have been written by women. "Rock Me to Sleep" has been referred to again and again as distinctively feminine in its sentiment, and it chanced to be a member of that sex who was responsible for the words of the "homey" song.

Elizabeth Akers Allen, who long wrote under the nom de plume of Florence Percy, was born in Strong, Maine, in 1832. In early womanhood, she married Paul Akers, a sculptor, but he died within a year of their wedding. Later, she became the wife of E. M. Allen, of New York, but for many years she made her home in Portland, Maine.

While traveling in Italy, she wrote a little poem entitled "Rock Me to Sleep." This she sent to the Philadelphia Saturday Evening Post. It was published, and became immensely popular. Indeed, it appealed so strongly to the public that, within the next six years, several persons, numbering among them persons of both sexes, so closely identified themselves with the poem that they succeeded in convincing even themselves, seemingly, that they had written the song. Some drew so largely upon their imaginations that they publicly visualized the situation that had given rise to the inspiration.

Russell and Company, of Boston, who published it set to an air composed by Ernest Leslie, acknowledged that they had netted over $4,000 on it. They were naturally much pleased with the financial success of the little poem, and had the audacity to send a message to Mrs. Allen offering to pay her five dollars a piece for as many songs as she should write for them; providing, of course, that the said songs should prove as popular as the one already in their possession. So great was the vogue of the poem at the time that it was translated into practically all the modern languages. Mrs. Allen, however, never considered it her best work.

As might be supposed, just at the time, the absurd offer did not appeal very strongly to Mrs. Allen. But necessity does not permit one the privilege of insisting upon adequate return for service given, and the day came when the authoress found herself a homeless widow with two children to support. She recalled the offer of the publishers, and the paltry five dollars were magnified into a very desirable sum of money. She accordingly sent to the Russell Company a little song. It was promptly returned with the curt information that they could make nothing of it. One reads with an unholy joy the statement that the firm soon became bankrupt.

The poem, during the height of its popularity, was set to music by over thirty different composers. But Mrs. Allen always preferred the Leslie composition, which was the one sung in the camps and popular everywhere.

The music with which we are best acquainted at the present time is by J. Max Mueller. He came to the United States in his youth, and at the outbreak of the Civil War enlisted and served bravely through several battles in the Army of the Potomac. He wrote a surprisingly large number of pieces of music while in the field of action, and so closely identified himself with the American spirit of patriotism and progress that the fact of his foreign birth has been practically forgotten.

When one has read the life of Mrs. Allen at the time when her little poem was having such a vogue, a life so filled with care and sorrow and no monetary appreciation of her literary efforts—when a small and well-deserved return from her work was her unquestionable right—it was small wonder that her thoughts drifted back to her youth, and, in a moment when the burden of life became practically impossible to bear, she should long for the irresponsible joys of childhood, and she wrote:

"I have grown weary of dust and decay;
Weary of flinging my soul wealth away;
Weary of sowing for others to reap.
Rock me to sleep, mother! Rock me to sleep!"

Grand Opera Music at the Rivoli.

Lovers of grand opera music constituted the greater part of the audience at the Rivoli during the week beginning November 24. The feature was "My Cousin," Enrico Caruso's first screen production. The natural inference was that the bill would contain many grand opera numbers, and, in this respect, the audience was not disappointed.

The overture was "Fantasie," from I. Paggiacci, conducted by Erno Rapee. We have found by experience that the more familiar an orchestra is with a selection the more careless is its rendition. And the fantasie was no exception to the rule. Mr. Rapee labored hard enough, but his efforts were in vain. The orchestra simply would not or could not respond.

Miss Annie Rosner sang the "Bird Song," from I. Paggiacci, excellently, and the "Prologue" from the same opera was most artistically rendered by Vincente Ballester. Both singers were dressed in costume, and this fact helped to convey the Italian atmosphere desired. The artists received an ovation, and could have responded to an encore had the rules of the Rivoli permitted.

The musical setting for the Animated Pictorial was excellent and as inspiring as usual.

For the feature a number of Italian Folk Songs, Nevin's "A Day in Venice" and several selections from grand opera were used to fit the scenes. In this picture, Mr. Caruso is shown several times singing. The orchestra followed him in perfect synchrony, and the effect was so realistic that we had only to draw upon our imaginations a bit to hear the bell notes of this splendid tenor float from the screen to us in the audience. But there were times in the action of the picture when it was fortunate for the orchestra that Mr. Caruso could not become animated and step from the screen. He might do violence to someone for the careless manner in which some of the big numbers were played.

As a breathing spell between the feature and the comedy the orchestra played Langley's "Selection of Italian Folk Songs." These characteristic songs were superbly rendered, but they lost much of their intrinsic value, as a number of them had been previously played on the program.

The comedy, "Whose Little Wife Are You," was fitted with popular music of the day, while the organ solo, always good, closed the bill.

Comparisons are odious, and it is beyond doubt wrong to contrast any orchestra with one at the Metropolitan. That is one danger in playing operatic music; the association of ideas in the minds of the audience. But for some reason the Rivoli orchestra did not do itself justice while playing this bill on the night we saw it. And we shall maintain until the last that it is a mistake for a conductor to turn and glower at any one in the audience even if some old lady does get a bit garulous and unthinkingly try to drown out the music. Of course, such a situation is trying on the nerves of the long-suffering musician, but if he rises above the annoyance someone sitting near the offender can be depended upon to quell the disturbance.

Music at Regent Theatre in Toronto.

As soon as we arrived in Toronto, our former home town, our natural inclinations impelled us to note the musical part of picture presentation. Being told that the Regent Theatre provided the best music for pictures, we paid it a visit, and were delightfully surprised at the program offered.

The overture rendered by a twenty-two-piece orchestra consisted of selections from the Hippodrome success of last season. Conducted by Mr. John Arthur, it was brilliantly executed. The orchestra plays well together, and the violin section proved specially strong both in technique and quality.

Followed then the feature, "Tuggles of Red Gap." This picture deals in dignified comedy, and the music fitted the scenes admirably. There was no test for atmosphere or synchrony, and the light intermezzos, waltzes and two-steps seemed appropriate.

Frank Bessenger, a tenor of pure lyric quality, sang some popular songs with much gusto. His choice of such songs as "Smiles" seemed to lower the dignity of the splendid music of the earlier portion of the program, and we question its wisdom if provided as a regular diet. The singing took up too much time because of the response to encores. In the best theatres no encores are permitted, as it throws out the time schedule and turns the house into a concert hall. Soloists are for the purpose of resting the eye and disconnecting the ideas between two pictures; therefore, their songs should be short and suggestive of the entree or appetizer to a feast.

The pictorial review was well fitted by the orchestra. Two or three Oriental scenes occurred, and the music was most appropriate. For almost a week the orchestra had played the review, yet no synchrony existed; phrases were broken and keys clashed much to the discomfort of the ear.

John Arthur, the genial musical director, has had full charge of the music for the Regent since its opening over two years ago, and has built for himself and his orchestra a reputation that is enviable. He firmly believes in the great art of picture playing and the responsibility involved therein.

"Picture playing is only in its early infancy," he said, "and we may look forward to some wonderful strides in raising the standard of its art. The day will come when music scores will accompany every picture and unimportant flashes will be eliminated for the musician's benefit by the close co-operation between picture directors and musical arrangers. These flash-backs break the continuity of the music, and a smooth performance becomes almost impossible."

Director Arthur will try to get together a Picture Playing Club in Toronto to keep pace with Cleveland and Toledo. Every city needs a fraternal association of this kind for mutual encouragement and protection, and, as usual, Toronto is close to the head of the procession.

W. H. Elliott, the managing director of this beautiful theatre, is confident of the efficacy of silence during the screening of pictures, and exhorts his audience by means of a traveling title that they should consider the pleasure of their neighbor and refrain from speaking the title or telling the story of the film plot. He has had the Regent tastefully decorated, and every comfort is provided for the patrons. It reflects the best theatres in many details, while in some it excels them.

David Mendoza, the brilliant violinist who occupied the chair of second concertmaster of the Rialto Orchestra during the past year, now heads the orchestra at the Rivoli as first concertmaster, taking the place made vacant by the resignation of Alberto Bachmann. Mr. Mendoza made many friends at the Rialto, and has proven worthy of the promotion accorded him.

Questions Answered—Suggestions Offered.

Q. Will you please inform a picture "fan" through your columns if "Dawn," by Vannah, is a song or an instrumental composition? The organist in our local theatre used it as a theme in the showing of "The Doll's House," starring Elsie Ferguson. To me it made a very effective musical atmosphere. Although I am not connected with the moving picture business in any way, I have always taken an interest in them, especially the musical end. For that reason, I have subscribed to the Moving Picture World, and heartily endorse the plan of making the musical department larger. It is my opinion that the moving picture has fostered a love for good music in the people of America more than anything else has done before. In the leading theatre of our city we have a "Fotoplayer." To my mind this is the best organ for a small town theatre, as a small orchestra is worse than none at all. The attendance at this theatre is always capacity.

A. Your letter gave us much pleasure. We are always glad to hear from music lovers whether connected with the picture industry or not. And, of course, it encourages us to have the musical department of the Moving Picture World praised. We are extremely anxious to have this department of universal service and are happy when we hear that it is serving the ends for which it was created. The musical selection, "Dawn," by Vannah, is a piano solo called a "song without words," and can be obtained from the publishers, M. Witmark & Sons, or through the Music Service Exchange, 507 Fifth Avenue.

Q. Can you tell me anything about an offer being made by a New York publication for a national hymn?

A. We understand that the New York American offers five thousand dollars in prizes for a new national song. We would suggest that you write them for details.

Q. I plead guilty to musical snobbery in that I have always regarded picture music as a prostitution of art. My views have changed, and I am anxious to learn how to fit pictures. Where can I procure a text-book?

A. At present there is no authentic text book on the subject, but we believe that one is being written and soon will be published. We shall keep your name and address before us and send you a notice immediately upon its publication.

Q. I find great difficulty in obtaining the music suggested in cue sheets for the reason no publishers are mentioned. Why could not this defect be remedied?

A. It is hardly possible to give the names of music publishers in the cue sheets, but by writing The Music Service Exchange, 507 Fifth Ave., New York, or Belwin, Inc., Columbia Theatre Building, New York, any music you need will be furnished. Just mention the name of the piece and its composer. They will do the rest for you.

Song Creates Sensation at Navy Yard.

One of the songs that just fits in with the spirit of the time is "You Can't Beat Us, if It Takes Ten Million More." The song is the work of J. Keirn Brennan and Ernest R. Ball and is published by M. Witmark & Sons. At the Navy Yard in Philadelphia this song made a great hit when a rally was held there. Judge Buffington, who was one of the speakers, asked for a copy of the words after it had been sung, and made it the subject of his address. Mrs. Stotesbury and three or four admirals, who were on the platform, were so carried away with the song that they all joined in lustily when the chorus was sung.

Morrie Ryskind's Rhymed Review.

Appurtenant' to

"Tell That to the Marines."

Young Eliot Adam Brainard was a pacifistic lad;
No matter what you did to him, you couldn't make him mad.
When ruder men would challenge to come and have a fight,
Good Eliot Adam Brainard answered, "I don't think it right!"

Now Eliot Adam's sweetheart (Nancy Wolcott was her name)
Was just as keen for scrapping as her Eliot was tame.
And when we folks got in the war, Miss Nancy wasn't nervous
A bit. She said, "I'll get the Huns!"—and joined the Secret Service.

But Eliot Adam Brainard said he thought the war was stupid,
A statement that knocked all the hopes from Mr. John R. Cupid.
For Nancy overheard him and got mad as anything;
"Ring off!" she said—and gave him back his ex-engagement ring.

So Eliot said, "I'm going to the country; where it's quiet,
Where Nature's grand and everything—where war-talk's on a diet.
And there I won't be bothered by this military chatter;
There may be snakes and bugs and worms—but really, they won't matter."

Alas, alas; And woe is me! He rested not a bit. He Discovered that the country was as warlike as the city.
There was a German plotter who was plotting something awful,
And acting in a manner which is not described by "lawful."

Now, Secret Service Nancy was upon the plotter's trail,
And determined for to put him where he ought to be—in jail.
She sneaked up on that worthy, but the blighter overheard her,
And started in to play the gentle German game of murder.

Then Eliot Adam Brainard walked into this peaceful scene;
He kicked Fritz in the trousers, and he biffed him on the bean;
And when Fritz pulled a gun on him, intent upon a killin',
The erstwhile peaceful Brainard put a bullet through the villain.

And then he grabbed his lady fair and hugged her to his side,
And said, "You lucky girl, you! You will be my blushing bride!
I don't believe in killing, but that Hun somewhat upset me;
No Hun is going to get you, Hon! I do the getting, get me?"

And Eliot Adam Brainard is at present a Marine;
He gets a dozen Huns a day—some days he gets thirteen!
Each time that he "goes over," just a dozen Huns are missed;
And if he's short of bullets, why, he swings his paci-fist!

This tale has got a moral which we hasten to make clear.
We'll state it very simply, and we'll state it now and here
We'll state it very briefly, and we'll use no fancy phrases;
When a pacifist gets angry, he can fight like Helen Blazes!

The Cello an Exponent of the Voice.

As musicians know the cello is constructed practically from the same model as the violin, but with certain alterations. For instance, in relation to the pitch, it is smaller than the violin. Otherwise the cello would have a tremendous tone, and be so large that it would be impracticable.

It has a long and varied register, and these characteristics make the instrument invaluable as a medium for expressing the inflections of the human voice. In its lower register it has the richness and volume of a basso profundo, and its highest register is capable of interpreting the tones of the lyric soprano. These remarkable qualities make the instrument invaluable to composers.

Wagner, Verdi, and a host of other composers, appreciated the almost human qualities and possibilities of the cello, and their operas have many solo parts for this instrument. They realized that no other musical medium was so capable of expressing the emotions of romance and grief.

It is difficult to imagine what symphonies and chamber music would become without the elements of devotion and pathos conveyed by this splendid instrument.

When composers who do not play the cello or do not have a proper understanding of the instrument write exercises for it, it often happens that the cello is placed in an improper light. For, while it is capable of much technical exhibitions, composers are inclined to lose sight of the fact that it has many dissimilar voice qualities, and when quick register changes occur the instrument loses somewhat its tonal effect, as in each register the strength of the tone varies. In this way, especially in concertos, some of the most leading passages are covered by the orchestral accompaniment. Of course, in slow movements, this does not hold good, because the tones are carried above practically any accompaniment. Therefore, it is easy to comprehend that it is in the sustained melody that the cello is especially at home.

The cello literature embraces many concertos written by such great musicians as Haydn, Dupont, Moliue, Lindner, Davidoff, Saint-Saens and Dvorak. The cello sonatas by Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Rubinstein, Chopin, Mozart and Rachmaninoff are all noted and require no comment.

Popper and Servais are two men who have such an intimate understanding of the cello that even where their compositions are complicated from a technical standpoint the individuality of the instrument is distinctive and the tonal effect is not permitted to deteriorate.

If all cellists would appreciate the fact that this instrument is like a voice and play upon it singable music practically without exception, they would create greater popularity for it and add to the wealth of delightful musical entertainment.

There is no question of the great office of the cello in the orchestra, but in a church service, with the organ, it is a worthy substitute for the human voice; also, it is a solo instrument of beauty and power, and its possibilities in this field are practically limitless.

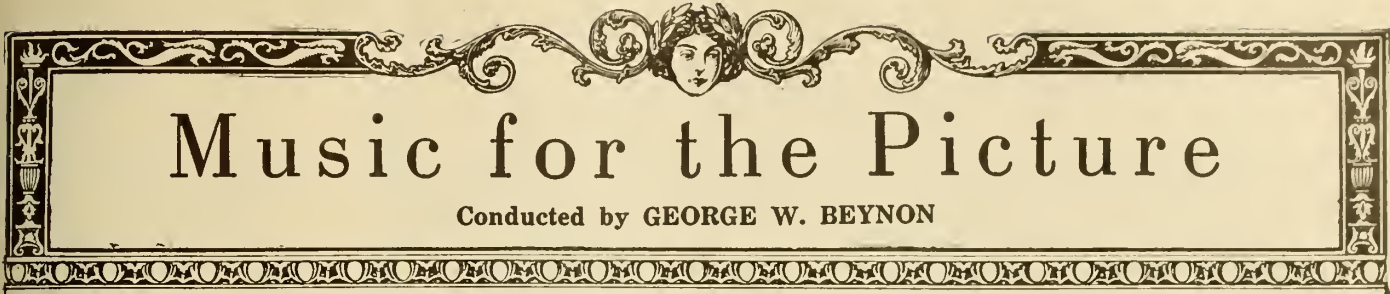

The "Musician" Changes Publishers.

The "Musician," published by Oliver Ditson Company, of Boston, Mass., since 1903, has been sold to the Henderson Publications, Inc., and beginning with the January issue, will be published at 2720 Grand Central Terminal, New York.

The editorial director is Mr. Vivian Burnett, who will be assisted by William J. Baltzell, associate editor. These gentlemen intend to make the "Musician" a magazine for the promotion of efficient musical instruction, being particularly for those who desire co-operation in teaching the student.

Music for the Picture

Conducted by GEORGE W. BEYNON

The Musical Alliance Calls for Your Support and Earnest Co-operation

THE annual meeting of the Musical Alliance of the United States was held at its offices, 501 Fifth avenue, New York, on Tuesday afternoon, November 19.

Before presenting the annual report, John C. Freund, the president, reminded the members that the Alliance was duly incorporated on October 29 of last year, under the laws of the State of New York, as a friendly organization—not for profit.

He recalled the events which led to the formation of the Alliance and showed that the idea of such an organization was the result of nearly half a century of experience in the musical world. It was more particularly the outcome of experiences that he had encountered in the last six years while traveling all over the country delivering addresses, calling attention to the progress the United States has made in musical knowledge and culture.

Some startling facts were brought to light in his masterly address. America spends for music in all its forms $600,000,000 per annum. Yet, in spite of this purchasing power, no central organization exists for musical people. American artists have always looked to Europe for their training and felt without the hall-mark of Germany their voices could command no respect at home. Mr. Freund has fought that idea for many years, both in his lectures and through the Musical America, of which he is editor. He has always contended that there are good vocal instructors in the United States and no real necessity has existed for foreign culture.

Thus, at no small personal expense, Mr. Freund launched the Musical Alliance, an organization for the betterment of musicians and musical conditions. It was founded to unite all interested in music and musical industries for certain specific aims.

Briefly, the Alliance demands full recognition of music and musicians as a vital factor in national, civic and home life. It desires that music be introduced into the public schools with proper credit for efficiency in study. It plans to advance the musical tastes of the people by assisting societies, clubs and associations, and by inducing municipalities to provide funds for free concerts. It stands back of the composer, singer, player, teacher and conductor and will oppose all attempts to discriminate against American music or musicians. Lastly, it favors a national conservatory of music and will urge that a department of Fine Arts be established in Washington. We feel that the fulfillment of all its lofty motives will lie in the establishment of a portfolio for music.

The Musical Alliance has a membership of 2,500 comprising all great singers, composers, conductors, and musical impresarios. It has not only enlisted the good will and support of the most prominent musicians and teachers, but also of the men who are at the head of the great musicians' organizations. It has members in over three hundred cities representing every phase of musical activity.

Even in so short a time, the influence of the Musical Alliance has been felt. In this connection, it should not be forgotten that whatever has been accomplished was done during the most trying time the musical world has known.

True to its chief aims, the Alliance has interested the Hon. Philander P. Claxton, Commissioner of Education in Washington. He attended a dinner given him by some members of the organization in New York, where he not only declared his sympathy with the work, but stated that he was engaged on a plan to improve and enlarge the scope of music in the public schools. The mere fact that Commissioner Claxton so favorably expressed himself regarding the value of public-school music has had a tremendous influence everywhere. It has strengthened the hands of those who in many places have been unable to secure any such recognition.

Through the activities of the Alliance, the press everywhere have given music more consideration than ever before.

The Alliance, furthermore, has been of considerable service to those engaged in getting up community choruses in various parts of the country. It has furnished plan and scope to those who are interested. Acknowledgment has been made for the great assistance which it has given to the section of the War Department engaged in providing singing leaders and music in the military camps.

The Musical Alliance has been instrumental in obtaining for the people of New York a larger appropriation for park concerts and that has been productive of good. Mayor Preston, of Baltimore, has appointed a director of municipal music, and that city of the south is rightfully proud of its musical prowess.

Another movement with which the Alliance has been identified and which is also gaining strength, is for the recognition of talent, not because it is American, German, or French, or bears a foreign hall-mark, but because of its merit. It likewise insists that in this country we shall have in our music what we put into our constitution, "that there shall be no prejudice on account of race, religion or previous condition of servitude."

The educational idea of the Alliance is not to develop the composer, but to create a condition of the public mind where people will be willing to accept a composer and not turn him down just because he happened to be called "American." The plea is not that anyone shall be recognized because he is American, but that he shall not be discriminated against for that reason.

Another plea is that music shall receive recognition in the national Government. Nothing can give the world outside a better and stronger idea that we are something besides dollar-grabbers, commercialists, interested in commerce and industry, than the fact that we do recognize the value of music, art and literature, and give the arts representation in the national Government.

Many things remain to be done and cooperation is solicited from all quarters where music is appreciated. The large number of picture players—48,000 musicians—must do their part in firmly establishing as a National institution, the Musical Alliance of the United States. Send in your name, accompanied by a crisp one dollar bill, to Milton Weil, the secretary, and he will enroll you as a member. America is practically the only country of any importance in the world that has not its Minister of Fine Arts. How long are you going to allow this to continue?

Exhibitors Mutual Provide Music Score.

Robertson-Cole Company have the right idea regarding music for the pictures. For Martin Johnson's "Cannibals of the South Seas" released by the Exhibitors' Mutual Distributing Corporation, they have provided a special score. These scores are available at all their exchanges and every exhibitor booking this wonderful film may rest assured that suitable musical atmosphere will surround the beautiful scenes of the islands of the Southern Pacific.

Martin Johnson personally supervised the setting, and from him were obtained many original melodies which had become familiar to his ear during his sojourn among these strange people. These themes are properly orchestrated in an ultra modern manner befitting the characteristic atmosphere.

The dance of the married woman upon the island of Vao is seen true to life and the flute and sand block accompaniment is claimed to be most realistic.

Savage music alone will hold the atmosphere and little resort is made to Oriental numbers. No exhibitor can afford to be without this musical service.

Our Rainbow Soldier Boys

Written For, and Dedicated To, the Rainbow Division Words and Music by

BETTY TILLOTSON

Read the words and rejoice with us in the wonderful sentiment that they express.

Your boy will be singing the song when he comes home;
why not be prepared to join him in the chorus:

"We are all mighty glad to meet you,
Our Rainbow soldier boys.
We are all mighty glad to greet you;
You fill our hearts with joy.
When we sadly saw the train go,
We pinned our faith to the Rainbow,
And we're all mighty proud of you,
Our Rainbow soldier boys."

"Price of Victory" Poorly Presented.

Sunday, December 8, there was presented at the 44th Street Theatre by the Arrow Film Company a picture called "The Price of Victory," the same being a pictorial review of the prominent part played in the world war by the Gurkas, of India.

The orchestra opened the performance by playing "God Save the King," "The Marsellaise" and "The Star Spangled Banner." After the chairman had extolled the virtues of Britain and her colonies, Captain Tupper, chief organizer of the Mercantile Scaman's Union, of England, was introduced.

His address was eloquent and in fine taste. He appealed to America to back up the recent pledge of his union, viz.: That for seven years no German would be allowed to work on English vessels, no German cargoes would be handled by English seamen, and the flag of the Hun would receive no salute from the union. He produced indisputable evidence of the perfidy of the Germans, and convinced his audience that the step was justifiable from every standpoint.

Dr. Girdswood was then introduced as the Canadian who had photographed the film called "The Price of Victory." After a short explanatory speech of patriotic fervor, the picture was screened.

There is no question regarding the merits of the feature. It has much educational value, and is intensely interesting. We wish we could praise the music in like manner; but, alas, for the efforts of amateurs! Remember that the picture deals with the East Indians, and, although the location is in France, Orientalism predominates at all times.

Only one number, "An Indian Melody," was used, and the balance of the setting consisted of waltzes and marches, with an occasional overture. The farcical side of the music lay in the fact that "Raymond" and "Light Cavalry" overtures are both distinctly German. No attempt was made for synchrony, and the music was broken off in the middle of a phrase or upon the second beat of the measure. The music actually burlesqued the picture, and nothing worse has been heard in New York in many a moon.

Sergei Rachmaninoff Comes to America.

Unheralded and unexpected, one of the most prominent Russian musicians of the age, Sergei Rachmaninoff, slipped quietly into New York City a few days ago on a steamer from Copenhagen.

This is not his first glimpse of America, because about nine years ago he appeared as pianist and an honor conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

M. Rachmaninoff brings with him his wife and daughter, and is stopping at the Hotel Netherlands.

When the Bolshevik regime began to create an unpleasant atmosphere in Russia, M. Rachmaninoff went to Denmark, and gave several concerts in that country, as well as in Norway and Sweden. He says that the musical life in these countries is quite normal, and that good concerts are really more frequent than in peace times, as these countries are a place of refuge for many musicians, who, under ordinary conditions, would be elsewhere.

M. Rachmaninoff was not able to bring manuscripts with him here, but is planning to give some of his time to composition while in this country. He has in his possession, however, a revision of his first piano concerto, which he obtained in Copenhagen through the courtesy of the Swedish Minister to Petrograd. This composition being one of his early works, does not entirely satisfy him, so he is revising the orchestration and some of the piano part. Only a week before the outbreak of the war, M. Rachmaninoff sent the final revised proofs of his "Third Symphony" to Leipzig, where practically all Russian music has always been printed, and he has never heard anything about it since. But now that peace has come, he hopes eventually to recover it.

He says: "Now Russia is freed from the Germans, who were really the power behind the Bolsheviki, my poor country will soon come upon better times. We can none of us ever be sufficiently grateful to your nation and its magnificent President."

"Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep."

Whenever a bass singer wins enough applause to warrant an encore, and he reappears—we find ourselves thinking, "Now he will sing 'Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep.'" We are seldom disappointed.

Mrs. Emma Hart Willard, the writer of this song, was another gifted New Englander, being born in Berlin, Conn., in 1787. She was one of seventeen children, but had most delightful home surroundings and parents of superior mentality. Remarkable from earliest girlhood, she became a woman whose fame as an educator extended throughout the world.

Her talent as an authoress—and she had to her credit many books on a diversity of subjects—was only an incidental side-line in her busy life. She was primarily identified with the education of women, and consecrated her life to the intellectual uplift of her sex with a singleness of purpose that precluded the possibility of many other interests.

Returning from a European trip which she made in 1830, she walked the deck of the boat one morning and watched the waves as they played on the sides of the vessel. Turning towards the Duke De Choiseul, who was one of her party, she dreamily said: "Rocked in the cradle of the deep, I lay me down in peace to sleep." The words spoken so spontaneously appealed to him as being worthy of preservation. He, accordingly, urged Mrs. Willard to write a poem which should embody the two lines she had just repeated, and promised that, when completed, he would set them to music. She went at once to her stateroom, and in a few minutes had written the verses as we know them. Giving them the title of the first line, she took them to the duke, who, faithful to his word, composed the music. His air did not receive popular favor, and is never heard now.

The words of this little poem have been so long associated with the name of Mrs. Willard that few of us have questioned the origin. But the National Dictionary of Autobiography gives credit to Thomas Noel, a poet, who was practically a contemporary of Mrs. Willard, being born in 1799. This gentleman had to his credit several pastoral rhymes. If the Noel claim is authentic, "Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep" is in no sense an American song.

Sometime later, John Philip Knight, an Englishman by birth, wrote the tune with which we are familiar, and the little song was launched on its popular and perennial journey. The gentleman responsible for the music spent several years in America, both as a teacher of music in New York City and in the capacity of musical instructor in Mrs. Willard's Female Seminary in Troy, New York. Unfortunately, Mr. Knight permitted himself to become dishonored and hurriedly left the country, disgraced in the eyes of his former friends. However, the weak man and the splendid woman have perpetrated their names with the masses not for what their lives signified, but for the simple little ballad which meant but a trifle to either of them. Such is the potency of song.

Effect of the Great War Upon Music Is Discussed and Analyzed by Great Artists

DAVID BISPHAM, the distinguished musician and singer, has comprehensively and intelligently summed up the conditions which have carried music through the great world war.

We are printing his article in full, believing it bears a message which will be appreciated by our readers:

"The extraordinary events at present taking place in the world will undoubtedly have a great effect upon music. In what way it will change the output is not as yet apparent, but such a cataclysm cannot take place without producing a profound effect upon every mortal happening.

"It may be that some sensitive people, such as musical composers are, will be so shocked as to be scarcely able to set pen to paper at all, while others will be exalted by the tragedy of the war as to produce compositions of such grandeur as never before have been heard.

"Up to the present time, however, all that we see is a superficial, though no doubt well intended, mass of songs and instrumental pieces, emanating from those whose musical attainments are not of the highest order. Though their intentions are of the very best, they are over-flowing with a patriotism which in itself is superb, but which in its expression lacks the depth of thought which alone can cause any work to have more than an ephemeral existence.

"Some songs there are which seem immediately to have made an enormous appeal, such as 'Keep the Home Fires Burning' and 'Over There,' but in case of the latter song one may confidently say that George M. Cohan, having had the inspiration to build a song upon the familiar trumpet call which prevails throughout its refrain, did not rest until, by very hard work, he had produced what he knew would be a success, for such is the characteristic of a man trained to please the public.

"One must not make the mistake of supposing that all music used to arouse patriotism was written with the idea of the present condition in which the world finds itself. 'Tipperary,' written before the war for vaudeville performances, is known to have been so strenuously applied to war purposes as to become for some reason so objectionable as to be withdrawn. Elgar's magnificent melody, first called 'Pomp and Circumstance' and later made into the song 'The Land of Hope and Glory,' had not war as its inspiration. It is an episode in the coronation march written for the accession of King Edward VII to the throne of England.

"Nothing in recent music has been finer in its tragic bearing than the symphonic work produced less than two years ago at Carnegie Hall by Bloch, the French Jew.

"There is sure to be a number of fine songs, odes, choral pieces, symphonies and operas resulting from the emotions now excited in every breast. Great poems have been written and greater may be expected, which, in their turn, will doubtless inspire musicians, and we may look for still greater things in the future. As yet, however, they have not appeared, in this country at least, though it is said that in England music is being written by some one, of a name hitherto unknown, whose power of expression is unsurpassed by any one of our time, unless by Richard Strauss. Indeed, the individuality and character of this music is such as to lead those who have seen it to suppose that Strauss, having taken refuge in England, is continuing his extraordinary labors there under another name. It is known that he was opposed to the war and refused high honors offered him by the Kaiser if he would side with the Government in its declaration and prosecution of hostilities.

"American composers have had their thoughts turned away from the pursuit of their calling, the younger ones being engaged in war work and doing nothing of consequence; but it is to be hoped that their elders may keep alight the musical torch that so illumines the pathway of mankind.

"Whatever may be the trend of composition in America, it is very sure that 99 per cent. of the music of German origin, for so long heard in our concert rooms, will be conspicuous by its absence during the approaching season and for a long time to come.

"Even the best songs by the most approved Germans are being put aside, for the present at least, and in some ways this may be a good thing. It may serve to eliminate from our concert programmes much music which but for its foreign flavor would have been immediately recognized as being inferior, while a great deal that is eminently worthy of attention written by our own American composers, who for so long have been struggling from under the shadow of the German colossus, will now be brought forward.

"I am the last one, however, to advise the banishment of certain classics by a dozen or so of the great musical minds of the world merely because they happen to have been born from a century to two and a half centuries ago in a country with which we now find ourselves at war.

"But there is one thing in which American music is being greatly benefited, propaganda, but nothing else musical has thus far been unearthed which bears the stamp of present warlike inspiration. Let us wait patiently for the wonderful things to come.

and that is by the insistence upon the use of the English language instead of German in song. I have for years been an ardent supporter of our native tongue instead of foreign languages whenever such a course is practicable, and I shall be heartily glad if one of the results of the war shall be a careful study of English, both in song and speech. This is not such a small matter as may be supposed; the mountain is not laboring to bring forth a linguistic mouse; but this is only one of the results of the operations of nature, which affect art, and, indeed, pass all understanding."

Madame Matzenauer, another celebrated songster, has very optimistic expectations regarding the future of music as an outcome of the war. She says: "The results of the war on music will be wonderful, you may be sure. The spirit of song is ennobled by tragedy, by suffering, by sacrifice—by the emotions which stir the soul to its depths. The war has done great things for the cause of music. For that I am grateful, even though I bleed for the sorrow of those who must bear its hardest burdens.

"Entirely aside from the inspiration which it has given and will give to composers capable of handling great themes, just think of the wonderful concerts held in New York, Chicago and in all the large cities. The necessity of raising large sums of money to carry on the Red Cross work, cantonment work, and to stimulate interest in the Liberty Loan and War Stamp drives put singers everywhere on their mettle.

"Before this great need arose, the singer had nothing save love of work and a share of box office receipts to urge him or her to effort. Now it is the call of humanity that urges us to give all we can. We have redoubled our efforts. The public responded more than ever before, because all the great concerts and gatherings of artists were given in the cause of patriotism."

No doubt part of the future has been sensed by these great singers, but no previous war has been productive of many masterpieces during the time of fighting. After peace has been declared and the thoughts of composers, shorn of fervent patriotism, free from anxiety, and normal in every way, go back over the historical episodes, then the music of inspiration will appeal. We may expect in the future many wonderful symphonies based upon the events of this world's most horrible holocaust.

No piece of merit has yet shown its head above the musical surface, and even in the popular field there has been only one real war song written during the war, for the war, and recognized as a wartime success. George M. Cohan's "Over There" stands out pre-eminently as the one musical number which has been inspired by the fighting armies in France. Many others have been written before the commencement of hostilities and adapted for patriotic

Channon Music Company Sees Big Field in Picture Music

THE Channon Music Company, with offices at 701 Seventh avenue—owned and managed by musicians, and for musicians—enters the music publishing field with much in its favor. F. C. Collinge, the owner, is a musician, and saw the possibilities in securing the services of Mr. Baron on his staff of music writers. The name of Maurice Baron is well known among players of good music, for many compositions of merit are to his credit.

Although a young firm, the Channon Music Company has placed on the market some fine orchestral selections, such as "Little Girl of Mine," a fox trot; "Where the Moonlight Shadows Play," waltz, and another favorite called "Your Smile."

The latest offerings are "Mamselle Caprice" and "Moonlight Shadows." These numbers are wonderfully adaptable for scenes in a bright picture, and being new should appeal to the orchestra leader strongly.

Mr. Collinge is well and favorably known in the theatrical world as a composer and manager. He has arranged many musical shows and made special orchestrations for some of our best known stars. There is no question about his musicianship, and the merits of his work should carry him far on the road to success.

Grind Organ Accompaniment at Rivoli.

An amusing accompaniment to the symphonic poem, "Iderle," by Liszt, was heard at the Rivoli during the week of December 8. The opening adagio movement had hardly commenced before the strains of a grind organ were heard above the bassi passages. During the pauses, the hurdy-gurdy stood out in bold relief and contributed a piece of humor that was not originally intended for the patrons of the Rivoli Theatre.

In spite of the diversion, the orchestra played the overture commendably. Mr. Rapee likes Liszt, and is more at home than usual in the works of this composer. The poem is extremely difficult in execution and a little too "heavy" for the average patron, but this is not a fault, for the best music only should be offered, whether it is understood or not. Musical education is to be found in picture theatres these days, and it is well that such is the case.

Emanuel List tried to sing "Little Grey Home in the West." We regret to state that his efforts proved a failure. He did not sing it; he belloved the notes, but gave no indication of what he meant. His English enunciation is extremely faulty and he cares not where he breathes.

"Un peu D'Amor," by Silesu, sung by Madeline D'Espinoy, proved pleasing for more reasons than that it was well sung. In the first place, the setting showed the half moon and the stars, so the singer seemingly sang from the heavenly firmament. This picture suggested what was to follow in the opening of the feature, "Under the Greenwood Tree"; secondly, the song itself breathed the spirit later found in the feature, and thirdly, it proved a wonderful introduction to Elsie Ferguson's great picture.

Before closing, we are glad to again praise the wonderful synchrony of the performance. The music at the Rivoli and Rialto always "comes out" right on the cue, and the key sequence is perfect.

Knowing the difficulties of such a feat, and in the spirit of the friendly critic, we have frequently hoped some one's foot would slip and a jarring note crop up to disturb the smoothness, but happily we are always disappointed. Nothing ever happens to break the musical continuity of the Rivoli picture presentation. We cannot speak too highly of this particular feature of the music, and sincerely hope every exhibitor in the country will follow Mr. Rothapfel's example.

Take care of the details of your performance and the show will take care of itself.

Score for "The Girl of My Dreams."

There will be a music score available for "The Girl of My Dreams," released by The Exhibitors' Mutual Distributing Corporation. George Beynon, the recognized authority on music for the picture, found in the Billy Rhodes feature a fitting vehicle for new music. The selections that are to be found on every leader's shelf have been given the congé, and excerpts from "Philemon et Baucis" have replaced them.

William Stickers, the well known composer, has written a number that fits the personality of Miss Rhodes and correctly interprets her character. This is the theme found in major and minor moods throughout the score. Mr. Stickers calls it "The Girl of My Dreams," and later promises to secure suitable words for a song, using the orchestral melody.

The score may be obtained from the exchanges of the Exhibitors' Mutual Distributing Corporation and should provide variety of color to its auditors. The musical score is certainly the thing these days, and every leader should avail himself of this opportunity to take a rest from his routine labors of setting the picture.

"Silver Threads Among the Gold."

"Silver Threads!" you recollect it?

I'll just bet a dime you do;

Trouble comes—I don't expect it;

Soon it has me pretty blue;

To my phonygraft I wander

An' I hear that good old song;

Takes me once again back yonder,

An' old Trouble goes along."

A little poem beginning with the above verse appeared recently in one of the New York papers. It expresses so eloquently the sentiment of all who have heard—and who has not?—this heart-stirring song—that we are quoting it.

Practically all our American songs have been conspicuous from the lyric standpoint. "Silver Threads Among the Gold" is an exception; for, aside from stating that the words were by Eben E. Rexford, the facts concerning the life of the musician alone will be considered.

Hart P. Danks, who became a well known and successful song composer, was born in New Haven in 1834. When he was but eight years of age, his parents removed to Saratoga, N. Y. Even as a mere child, he evinced a keen interest in music and was placed under the instruction of Dr. Whitney, a Saratoga physician, who was also an excellent amateur musician. The boy made such strides in his studies and had so good a voice that he was soon placed in the choir of the First Presbyterian Church, where he sang a solo the first Sunday—an almost unprecedented honor. In a few months he acquired the reputation of being the best music reader in Saratoga—all this before he was fifteen.

In 1850 the family removed to Chicago. In the meanwhile the voice of the boy had changed to a deep bass, and he had no difficulty in obtaining a choir position. Also by this time his natural ability for musical composition began to assert itself.

So far from being pleased at the talent displayed by his son, Mr. Danks, Sr., considered it as a weakness and put the young man to work at his own trade, that of a builder.

Fortunately, soon after this, William Bradbury, then a musical celebrity, presided over a convention in Chicago. Young Danks, whose life was centered in music, attended. He was impressed by the personality of Mr. Bradbury and believed his time had come to emancipate himself from the hated carpenter's bench. He accordingly presented to that excellent artist a copy of his first hymn tune, which he modestly asked to have examined and passed upon as to merit. Mr. Bradbury was so pleased with the melody that he accepted it and inserted it in his next book of sacred songs, under the name of "Lake Street." This event decided the future of Mr. Danks. He devoted himself to music study and composition.

In 1856 his first song arranged for piano, "The Old Love," was published, and in the same year "Anna Lee" was put out.

He removed to New York in 1864. Up to this time he never received remuneration for his compositions. But he decided to adopt a new system, and was soon in a position where paying publishers sought him.

"Silver Threads Among the Gold" was published in 1872. Over three hundred thousand copies were sold in this country alone, and it had almost an equal popularity in England.

Like most composers, Mr. Danks deplored the taste of the public. Those songs which he considered his best efforts were less known and less appreciated than others which were dashed off at a sitting and upon whose popularity he did not build.

He worked on untiringly and with great attention to detail as he knew it. His compositions embraced both secular and sacred pieces and were so prolific that in some years they numbered over fifty publications. It is a bit surprising that he achieved so marked a degree of success, as he never had a teacher. But he always attributed his good fortune to conscientious study and indefatigable labor. While never aspiring to be ranked as a great musician, and always conscious of his limitations, his work was of average merit, freely flowing and much appreciated by the people of his time.

Leader's Service Bureau. Questions Answered—Suggestions Offered.

Q—Our manager insists upon projecting the picture at the speed indicated in the cue sheets, and says that is the way the producer wants it run. Sometimes there is an indication of eleven minutes to the 1,000 feet and the characters race through the performance. What about it?

A—When the musical arranger views the picture in a projection room, it is frequently run fast, and the duration of scenes are comparatively short. He realizes that his timing is faster than ordinary theatre speed, and gives the ratio of eleven minutes to the 1,000 feet in order that the leader in selecting his music will extend a scene of two minutes to 15/11 of 2, which would be 2 min. and 43 sec. It has nothing to do with film projection.

Music for the Picture

Conducted by GEORGE W. BEYNON

The Question of "Timing" Looms Large In Proper Motion Picture Presentation

TEMPO means time or speed. It is closely allied to rhythm and accent in a musical sense and is related to movement and motion in a literal way.

In picture portrayal, there are many varieties of tempo calculations which enter into the musical setting. First, there is the speed of the operating machine, usually timed to a ratio of fifteen minutes to the thousand feet projected. Good "projectionists" have brought their art to a high standard and sometimes make it difficult for the orchestra leader to get co-operation. They believe that no set speed should be used for all pictures and they are obviously right in their contention, for it would be foolish to run a comedy as slowly as a heavy drama. Some operators believe in changing speed to enhance the screen action. If a funeral is shown, run it slowly; if a battle is fought, speed it up. This method also seems perfectly logical but is disconcerting to the average musical director. Nevertheless, there is in projection speed a fixed mathematical unit which plays an important part in the fitting of pictures.

There is the screen action—a form of tempo that permits no mathematical calculation—which must be seriously considered in the musical accompaniment. Naturally, the projection speed will materially influence the screen action and could, under certain conditions, ruin it. The screen action of the silent drama compares favorably with the "business" of the legitimate stage and the music should always follow the tempo of the play.

Thus, we find that from behind and in front of the orchestra or organ, there are two forms of tempo that seem detached but really belong to the music. They must be considered in the synchronization of the feature.

Musically, there are the terms "Adagio," "Andante," "Allegro," and so forth, signifying a certain tempo. These terms are merely suggestions unless followed by metronome markings, which give us another and more exact form of speed. Being dependent upon the time signature to a certain degree, metronome markings drag the former into our problem as a matter not to be lightly disregarded.

There is yet another factor with which to reckon in the musical portrayal of pictures and that is the time duration of scenes. This must be exact and the stop watch will make it so.

Thus we find six factors dealing with speed that every orchestra leader must take into consideration when playing pictures. They are closely related to each other and frequently one or more is disregarded without much loss. The thorough musician will analyze his score and base his selection upon the facts deducted. If it be a comedy, he will draw up the following table:

Projection speed..15 min. to 1,000 ft. film
Screen action	Fast
Music	Allegro
Time Signature	2/4
Metronome	1 = 160
Time duration	3 minutes

Scrutinizing the above table, he finds that the scene runs three minutes in time duration. The music is allegro to fit the screen action, which is fast. The time signature being 2/4 and the metronome tempo being 160 beats to the minute, there should be 80 measures to play each minute or the entire scene will require a piece comprising 240 measures.

If the scene be correctly fitted with music that suits the screen action, those 240 measures will always cover the time duration even if the projection speed be increased. To follow the action, the leader must of necessity increase his beat and, should the scene be rushed through in two minutes and a half, a little calculation will show that he must beat the rate of 192. As may be readily seen, a projectionist has the power to kill a picture by going to extremes. When he does, he will also kill the music. The music will assist in the slaughter and the patrons will flee such a charnel house.

When soldiers or civilians in gala attire are seen marching, the music should take the tempo of their step, and thus give the impression that the screen figures are parading to the time played by the theatre orchestra. Under no circumstances play a waltz, for the time signature must indicate two beats to the measure to conform to the feet of each man.

The primary purpose which promulgated this thought was to gain realism and those who adhere to the procedure do more than accomplish their object—they play to the screen action. They have brought to light and are fostering the fundamental principle in picture playing.

Screen tempo and projection speed must not be confused. The latter will give only a mathematical unit from which may be reckoned the time duration of the scene. Perfect synchrony does not depend wholly upon projection speed. If the screen action be closely followed by suitable music, any slight change in projection speed will be taken care of by a similar change in the conducting.

Remember that screen action cannot be gauged always by bodily movements. Flashes play a part in the speed of the screen and even in the pastoral and panoramic peaks of mountains there is a suggestion of action. In those moments of bodily action, there should be found no difficulty in determining the tempo of the music.

The heroine slowly drags herself across the room. Broken in spirit and tired of life, she decides that the cruel "world" holds no place for such as she. The music, keeping time to the mood, will be slow and mournful. Should the operator feel that she should flit blithely across the room, the scene will become much shorter in time duration and the musical selection too long if played at its required tempo. But the marked tempo cannot be adhered to if it does not fit the action. Therefore, by playing to the action, the same number of measures will still fit the shorter scene.

Later, the hero, supposedly dead, is seen hurrying to the home of his loved one in an automobile. He alights, hastens up the steps, rushes into the room and into her arms. At the rate of fifteen minutes to the thousand film feet, this scene takes one minute and thirty seconds. If eleven minutes be allowed for the projection speed, the duration of the scene becomes shorter.

Now, taking it for granted that the music selected has been played at 94 under normal conditions, and comprises sixty-four measures, it must be played at about 110 to fit the increased speed of screen action. The measures remain the same if the tempo be increased. Poor conducting and bad judgment would mean loss of synchrony and probably force a stop about the fifteenth bar.

First, find your projection speed unit and time your scenes accordingly. Select the music which fits the screen action and make it synchronize with the scene as projected. After the setting has been completed, forget minutes and seconds and conduct from the screen. Let it be your score and nothing except a cyclone can break the smoothness of your musical accompaniment.

The Exhibitors Desire Musical Scores.

Showing the upward trend of music in the picture theatres of the smaller sort, we present the following letter:

Oneonta, New York,
December 22, 1918.

Mr. George W. Beynon,
New York City.

Dear Sir: Do you have music score of "La Fayette, We Come?" If so, kindly state rental price for one or two days. Am not certain about dates.

Yours very truly,
Ivan D. Bush.

Numerous inquiries come to us from all parts of the country and for various pictures. In many cases, we must disappoint our correspondents. But, thank heaven! the producer sees the hand-writing on the wall. The day is coming when he will have sense enough to protect his picture by proper musical presentation and at the same time give the exhibitor an opportunity of procuring new music pleasing to the ears of his patrons.

Music for the Picture

Conducted by GEORGE W. BEYNON

The Responsibility of the Exhibitor Toward His Musical Director Is Great

WHEN first the "movies" turned to music for a betterment of performances, the pianist was regarded as a necessary evil and received the same treatment as a magnate accords a ditch digger. To the exhibitor, he was merely a puncher of piano keys, a new toy for display, and a poor reason to raise the price of admission to ten cents.

Those days have passed and with them went the universally poor opinion of the musical director. By the far-seeing employer, he is today a man of importance, an expert in his line, a vital necessity to the theatre presenting pictures. In the larger picture houses he commands a big salary and he has the responsibility of the musical program thrust upon him. Usually he is the conductor of a big orchestra, and when not conducting, he is seeing the next week's picture or putting together the program for the following show. Besides, there are the usual rehearsals necessary to a good performance for which he is held accountable. His duties are manifold and, if conscientiously and intelligently performed, the music becomes a paying feature of the theatre. His technical ability is called into play continually to solve many musical problems. His hours are longer than those of the projectionist; his work more onerous.

As a general rule, these facts are appreciated by the exhibitor and he regards his musical director as an executive head of a department in his business. Many exhibitors buy the music for their leaders, realizing that from the salary of the latter, they cannot afford to invest in a big library. This method is right from every standpoint. It leaves the leader bereft of the excuse that he must repeat numbers owing to his meager assortment of musical selections. If a change of director is necessary, the exhibitor still has a fine library to offer the successor.

Many musical directors have placed at their disposal a small office which contains all the paraphernalia incident to their profession. This is a good policy for it instills in their minds a sense of possession and importance that is a spur to greater endeavor.

The big musician of today is given every help and every comfort in order that his work may not suffer nor deteriorate. But what about the little fellow in a ten and fifteen-cent house?

There are, even yet, a few exhibitors who cannot recognize the importance of music, or musicians. These have the "necessary evil" idea and carry it out in their attitude. They plant a leader in a pit and tell him to go to work for as many hours as possible and demand as much noise from three instruments as possible from thirty. They hire an organist and tell him to "grind" from noon until eleven p. m. If he is a good boy, he may get thirty minutes for supper while the reel-boy relieves him at the consul.

An exhibitor of this class has no right to succeed and, naturally, he stays in a rut year after year, barely gaining a livelihood for himself while his progressive competitor in the next block makes a nice little clean-up.

Every exhibitor owes a duty to his employes and especially to the temperamental and artistic musical director. When treated like a dog, his art is forgotten and his music becomes a drudgery. Nothing can be gained from a disgruntled employe, therefore it behooves the exhibitor, in his own interests, to treat the musician courteously.

Art cannot flourish in a pig sty or a draughty stable. Give your musicians a comfortable place to work and do not expect them to labor by the hour. Insist on quality at all times and allow sufficient rest periods to make that quality possible.

Above all, the exhibitor should see that his musical director is provided with all available musical data furnished for the features he expects to play. Get him the cue sheets, orchestra scores if possible, and any hints found in the trade-journal, reports of the picture presentation in other theatres. Bring him directly into the industry and make him a picture fan as well as a picture player. See that he subscribes to one of the trade journals and give him a list of your future bookings. Thus, he may read the story of the feature to be run the next week. He will note the comments of the reviewers and procure the cue sheet for early analysis. He may also read how the picture was musically set at one of the bigger theatres and be encouraged to suggest special and spectacular stunts to enhance its presentation.

Always co-operate with him. Make him feel that you have his interests at heart and encourage his propagation of new ideas. They may not all be possible, yet one may bring large monetary returns. Treat your musical director as a human being and your music will improve a thousand per cent.

Moving Picture World Will Pay Respects to Musicians

We have, from time to time, called the attention of the orchestra leader to these columns. We have pointed out the fact that "Music for the Picture" is his department and the Moving Picture World officially recognizes him as an important person in the picture industry. We are here to help him in every way possible; to solve his musical problems and assist him in his effort to raise the standard of picture music.

Many musicians have taken advantage of the opportunities afforded them through the Moving Picture World and kindly expressed regret that they did not come into the fold earlier. There are still hundreds of leaders, organists and pianists from whom we long to hear. Tell them about the department that pleases you and point out its labor-saving usefulness.

We are about to send our representative, Mr. Bregstein, to call upon you. Every leader wants to know what the other fellow is doing and, as these columns are run for that purpose, our representative will request an interview with you. Give him all the programs. Tell him how you present your pictures. Show him your library and don't keep your ideas a secret.

It is not our intention to filch from you a formula which you consider peculiarly your own, but your fellow musicians need your suggestions and co-operation. If you have a photograph to spare, let us see what you look like, that you may become known—not only for your brilliant mentality—but for your physical lines of strength.

America is a large country and he may not reach you for some time. Don't wait for him. Send in your story at once. Let it be short, concise and helpful. You may start something. If you do, so much the better. No progress is made in any art by continual and quiet acquiescence. These columns will welcome discussions where personalities are absent.

Picture players are trying to get along in a new profession by individual effort. This is a slow process at best and cannot be productive of great results. Co-operation should be their pass-word and good music for the pictures, their slogan. Let us help you.

Welcome to "Our Rainbow Soldier Boys."

When the Rainbow Division returns, laden with laurels and resplendent in glory, they will bring with them an augmented band that number eighty-five musicians. This comprises twenty-five French buglers and drummers. The musical efficiency of this corps is beyond question. It has distinguished itself abroad and will prove a pleasant surprise to the folks here.

Betty Tillotson, a versatile Red Cross nurse, has written a marching song dedicated to the Rainbow Division, entitled "Our Rainbow Soldier Boys," which is popularly hailed as a true tribute to this regiment. The Rainbow band will play it and the soldiers will sing it. The words are catchy and the melody is tuneful.

The Harp an Instrument of Antiquity.

Among the musical implements whose strings are set in vibration by the fingers, the most important is the harp. This splendid instrument is of great antiquity, antedating the earliest records of civilization. It was doubtless suggested by the taut strings of the bow, as the ancient relics bear a striking resemblance to that primeval requisite of warfare.

The only authentic evidence that we have of the great antiquity of the harp is, with few exceptions, handed down to us through the Egyptian sculptors. One instrument carved on a tomb in Thebes gives us data reaching back over three thousand years, as the history of the burial place has been traced to the thirteenth century before Christ.

A few years ago, a sculptured tablet was discovered in Babylonia, which archaeologists dated 2500 B. C. One of the figures carved on it was represented as playing a harp of eleven strings. This instrument had no front pillar, and the early Egyptian and pre-Christian Irish harps were of similar construction.

The harp, in a crude form, was a favorite with the ancient Britons. The old laws of Wales mention it among the things necessary to distinguish a gentleman from a slave. Indeed, the laws forbade a slave from touching a harp, and it was exempt from seizure for debt, as a man who had no harp lost caste and was degraded to the rank of a slave in the public esteem.

In the old diatonic form, the performer could only modulate by the use of his thumb when he desired to stop the vibration of the strings or alter the pitch. A Bavarian, named Hochbrucker, invented pedals to overcome this difficulty. True, they were extremely crude and awkward, but they paved the way for later and more satisfactory achievements.

The modern harp was practically the work of Sebastian Erard, who perfected it in 1810. The instrument had been changed from Hochbrucker's day until it possessed two pedals, and the tuning was changed from Eb to Cb, making it possible to play in thirteen keys. This fact, and the added advantage of simplicity of fingering, which was the same in every key, made the instrument extremely popular.

The foreign harps were never very successful in America. The musical tastes of our country called for perfect workmanship, and the vagaries of the climate here were too great a strain upon an instrument made for more benign atmospheric conditions.

Realizing the shortcomings of the European instruments, Lyon & Healy, of Chicago, put out a harp which they did not intend for a money-making proposition, but as a splendid advertising medium. The first harp they produced cost them $15,650; but through it they acquired a world-wide reputation, the action in their harps being famous everywhere. The firm of C. H. Ditson & Co. are the agents in New York. If one aspires to be wafted instantly from Manhattan Island to the court of Louis Thirteenth, there is no surer way than to enter the fascinating Ditson harp room, where there is on display instruments ranging from the crude harp with no pedals to a most impressive and exquisite instrument valued at $10,000.

At the present time, notwithstanding the graceful lines and the great beauty of tone of the harp, it has been practically supplanted in the home by the piano. Several causes have contributed to this regrettable condition. A harp of superior quality entails great expense, the tuning is beyond the powers of the average amateur, and a great many selections possible on the piano are not playable on the harp.

But, whereas the use of the harp has declined in domestic life, the contrary is found in the orchestra. The first record of the use of an orchestral harp occurs in an account of the "Ballet Comique," on the occasion of the marriage of Mary of Lorraine in 1582. For many years, the harp was not used in any but grand opera or symphony aggregations. But now, it is frequently met with in the smaller orchestras. The color and beauty of tone possessed by it have won the appreciation of the masters of music, and the scores of Meyerbeer, Gounod, Berlioz, Liszt and Wagner are not complete without it.

Some New Numbers for Your Library.

T. B. Harms & Francis, Day & Hunter, one of the strongest music publishing firms in America, and the staunch friend of orchestral leaders, are putting forth every effort to be of service to the motion picture industry.

They have recently issued the selection for Follics of 1918, which should prove interesting to leaders everywhere. "Starlight," a little intermezzo that is whistled on the streets; "Garden of My Dreams in Tokio," a Japanese melody that is pleasing, and "When I'm Looking at You," are three hits that cannot be overlooked. The by the Authors and Publishers' Association if they expect to please their patrons. Almost all the musical hits of the season are to be found in its catalogue and people expect to hear them.

T. B. Harms & Francis, Day & Hunter usually manage to put over some big ones, and this season is no exception to the rule.

The Strand Offers Usual Fair Program.

The Strand rendered the usual program for the week of December 29. It was not what one could praise with any degree of accuracy, but averaged up to the Strand calibre.

"Isabelle Overture" was written by Von Suppe in his younger days and in a lighter vein. It was frothily melodious, not specially pretty, and totally lacking in merit. The orchestra had no difficulty in its performance and the audience showed their good nature.

Miss Claire Aimec, with her violin, held the stage too long for comfort. Her work is very mediocre; intonation poor and entirely too mechanical. She comes to New York with a good reputation as a prize pupil from the Paris Conservatories.

It seems a pity that she makes no great effort to add to her laurels.

The duet, "L'Angelus de la Mer," sung by Alys Michot and Von Collignon, in costume, provided a novel touch that gave a little tone to the entertainment. The rendition was satisfactory.

The playing of the Topical Review and the feature was only fairly well done. In the first instance, the synchrony of selections was better than usual, but during the feature, synchrony was absent. At the scene of pre-historic people, the Bacchanalian Dance was started by two second violins and a trumpet because the other instrumentalists were tardy in getting in from the rest period. Decidedly poor; eh, what? Well, rather!

The Strand management must realize that it cannot offer a slipshod performance to the public and retain its patronage. No longer is it alone in the field, and more competition is arising. The Strand has a good orchestra, a fine conductor, and a large library, but its musical program resembles that put together by school boys.

There IS an art in picture playing and concrete examples aplenty to hand; why not in the Strand, the cradle in which picture music was born?

Questions Answered—Suggestions Offered.

Q—Once in a while the orchestra is requested to put on an extra rehearsal if a big feature is booked, and a special musical score is provided. Are we supposed to rehearse free, or not?

A—If you are non-union it becomes a question between you and your manager. He has a perfect right to ask you to rehearse free, and if you are foolish enough to accept, it becomes your funeral. On the other hand, if you belong to the A. F. of M., look up your rule book, or consult the president of your local, who will set you right in the matter.

Q. What was the date of the opening of the Academy of Music in New York City?

A. The Academy of Music was opened October 2, 1854, with the opera "Norma," having in the cast Grisi and Morio. The building was burned in 1866, but reopened in February of the following year. The uptown trend of the population and the building of more modern theatres have served to convert this erstwhile show playhouse into a picture theatre.

opening March Militaire is also useful for short scenes of a military character. This number can be used in its entirety with comedies that are dignified, such as the Sydney Drew type.

A splendid love theme published by the same firm is "Night Is for Loving and Dreaming," written by the composer of that popular hit, "Somewhere a Voice is Calling." The piece is in A-flat and lends itself to picture playing because of its short phrases. The melody is insidious, and without realizing it, the auditors will go away humming the tune. This is the kind of new music that the leader wants, and if more of it were published, fitting the feature would lose some of its tediousness.

Exhibitors are beginning to realize that they cannot do without music controlled Picture Music for Our Fighting Boys.

In keeping up the spirits of the soldiers at the front, moving pictures and music—good and otherwise—have performed a splendid mission. The "boys" learned to smile through every vicissitude, and our own American lads had the reputation of being the happiest of all. They have all learned to sing, and music has become a necessity in their lives. They will look for it when they get back, and it's up to us to see that it is given them in our picture houses. After their nerve-racking experiences, they cannot be expected to sit and silently watch a picture. They need the influence of music which shall drive away unpleasant thoughts and lift them out of themselves. Probably, they will not be keen for grand opera stuff just at first. "Over There" will doubtless bring more applause from them than the best thing Puccini ever wrote. But they will surely resent hearing the piano for interminable periods while the orchestra go out to smoke or fall asleep in the pit. It might be an excellent idea to play a familiar air occasionally and encourage the soldiers and sailors in the audience to lead in putting over one of their camp songs. Picture houses were put up primarily as a money-making proposition, and if they prove places of recreation to the boys coming home—and they must have recreation—the theatres will live up to their chief aim and fulfill an unquestioned duty at the same time.

Music Recognized as a Material Aid to Pictures.

A letter recently received by a prominent production company of New York from a live exhibitor in the West should forever settle any possible doubts existing in the mind of an exhibitor as to the efficacy of music with pictures. It so thoroughly coincides with the attitude being assumed by the more progressive exhibitors all over the country that we are quoting from the interesting letter in part: "Under separate cover I am returning to you your copy of music. Kindly accept my thanks for the use of the same and permit me to say that special scores like this one, as well as the score for —, adds much to the musical interpretation of the pictures. "Our musical director, as well as myself, will appreciate it very much if you will call our attention to any special scores that you have, or get in the future for any of your pictures." This letter voices the cry that is abroad in the land. Eventually, the call will be so insistent that it must be satisfied.

Music for the Picture

In the Collation of Picture Programs Musical Atmosphere Plays a Big Part

More and more important is becoming the musical aspect of the exhibitors' performances. They realize that patrons love good music and fully appreciate the atmospheric touches brought forth by the picture. This subject is close to our heart, and we feel that every manager of a picture house should know of the benefits to be derived from a program which holds a continuity of one idea.

During the week of January 5th, the Rivoli Theatre, of New York, offered an Indian bill, which transcended any performance hitherto seen by us. We submit the following program for analysis:

1. RIVOLI PICTORIAL
Edited by Rothapfel
2. OVERTURE
Selections from "Natoma," Victor Herbert
Hugo Reisenfeld and Erne Rapee
Conducting
3. SCENIC
"The Land of the Great Spirit"
Prizma Color Pictures of the Blackfoot Country
4. "INVOCATION OF THE GREAT SPIRIT"
By Chief Red Eagle of the Blackfeet
5. FEATURE
Norma Talmadge in "The Heart of Wetona"
6. COMEDY—"QUANNAH'S FAMILY TREE"
Cartoonist Felton reports on Wetona's family
7. ORGAN SOLO
"Marche Triumpale,"
By Joseph Callaerts

The Pictorial Review opened the show, which is unusual in the extreme; but there was no other logical position for it if the Indian atmosphere was to be held throughout.

The Overture, selections from "Natoma," by Victor Herbert, provided a splendid introduction to what might be called the show proper. Although not decidedly primitive, except in the "Dagger Dance," and more reminiscent of Herbert than of Indian, it served its purpose. The Rivoli orchestra, under the baton of Joseph Klein, gave it a careful reading.

Without a pause, the music broke into the accompaniment for "The Land of the Great Spirit," a prizma color picture, depicting Indian life and the haunts of the aborigine. It was a pretty picture, well handled musically.

Then followed an incantation, proclaimed by a real Indian, a chief among the Blackfeet. It was short and well intoned by the customized chief. Standing upon a rock he called to Gitchi Manitou, the Great Spirit:

Called Him from the West a-glowing,
Called Him from darkened East;
From the North, its winds a-blowing;
From the south while slowly turning;
Bared his heart in all its yearning—
Called Him loudly as to a feast.

"The Heart of Wetona," with Norma Talmadge, was the feature presented. The music continued to be atmospheric and well suited to the scenes.

Even the comedy dealt with the stoical humor of the Indians, and when the curtain fell one felt thoroughly permeated with weird melodies.

What wonderful possibilities are to be found in pictures! When carefully collated they may take you into Japan, and for two hours you revel in the gaiety of the Orient and listen to the peculiar musical modes of the Land of the Setting Sun. All climes are at our door, and the educational value cannot be overestimated. The day is coming when picture theatres will offer a program that will enlist the appreciation of patrons of the highest intelligence, culture and refinement. It has been the "Poor Man's Pleasure," but if the producers, exhibitors and musicians put into it the best effort, the deepest thought and co-operation for the greatest result no form of amusement will equal its universal popularity.

Music Service Requires Attention from Exchanges

ALTHOUGH we failed to hear Ralph Ruffner from Butte, Montana, which was distinctly our loss, but which on the other hand was unavoidable through lack of invitation, we are glad that he came East. His timely appearance, his frank talks, and his pertinent disclosures, have put into the fourth industry a momentum that is sure to be productive of great results before the velocity is spent.

The exchangemen have come in for a quiet rebuke. It has been shown that they are negligent and slipshod in the treatment of exhibitors. Especially strong was the arraignment against their system—or lack of it—in handling accessories.

We know that Mr. Ruffner did not mean all exchange men and our sense of honor will not permit us to add another kick at the fellow who is down, but we believe that this is the psychological moment to bring up the matter of music service.

From actual statistics this department has learned that very few of the orchestra leaders receive the cue sheets sent to the exchange by the producing company. If the music service be sandwiched into the press sheet it will in all probability reach the exhibitor. The desk of the exhibitor is a long way from the music stand of the orchestra leader. Mr. Exhibitor has little time to clip the cue-sheets for the leader. This fault cannot be charged to the exchange, for the producer is the guilty party.

How many exchanges will put the name of the orchestra leader, or the pianist, or the organist upon their mailing lists? Not 1 per cent. They claim that their postage bill is high enough without increasing it for the benefit of art.

To be absolutely certain of acquiring the cue sheets, the musical director must go in person to the exchange, if possible, and ask for them. Then more trouble begins. He is referred to many people, who refer him to others, and eventually, if he be lucky, he will meet some one in the exchange who knows what he is talking about. In one case, an exhibitor was forced to go to one of the biggest producing companies in America and give a receipt to its president before he could obtain a little slip of paper called a cue sheet. This seems incredible, but the fact remained that the president knew that his company had cue sheets. He did not know what they were for, and thinking that there was an intrinsic value attached to them he played safe by getting the exhibitor's receipt.

When the writer was putting out scores for a certain company, one of its exchanges wired in, asking why its weekly quota had not been received. We answered that six scores a week had been delivered. An angry wire of denial came back in reply, and thoroughly satisfied that our duty had been done we closed the issue by sending four words, more in the spirit of fun than from any accurate knowledge: "Look in the cellar." Our instructions were followed and half the basement was found filled with perfectly good orchestral scores, worth ten dollars a piece.

There are two forms of music service now being issued by producers to the exchanges. Both cost money and are provided for the purpose of proper picture presentation. Whether it be cue sheets or scores, the exchange should put a man in charge of that service department if results are to be obtained from dollars spent. We have always felt that all branches of the producing and distributing organizations are anxious and willing to please the exhibitor. They want to please, but in many cases are ignorant of the value of many of the accessories which they handle. Don't overlook music, for it is one of the biggest factors in the exhibition of features. Systematize the music service in the exchanges and the orchestra leader will praise the efficiency to his employer. This means a satisfied customer on long contracts.

The Flute Descends from the Stone Age.

Musical instruments resembling the flute, in which a column of air is set vibrating by the lips, are of very ancient origin. The Japanese, Chinese and Hindus maintain that these modes of musical expression have been in use among their people from time primordial. Indeed, according to authentic records, a primitive form of flute is the most ancient musical instrument in the world's history. The most complete and remarkable examples of the stone age are the Egyptian flutes which are capable of a complete diatonic scale. Bronze relics of a somewhat later period have been discovered in Belgium.

Undoubtedly, the great antiquity of the flute is due to its simplicity of construction and the availability of materials. Bones, bamboo or reed were the three substances universally used, and one of them was always procurable everywhere. Even today the Caribs in Guiana make their flutes from bones. Previously they used the bones of the jaguar but, as the animals became more scarce, they resorted to human bones; appropriating for the purpose those of their enemies. With this evidence at hand, it is not difficult to understand how the flute was formerly more associated with war than with peace.

Flute playing was so highly favored in ancient Greece that the art was made a part of the curriculum of the Athenian schools. And there were times when the instrument was so greatly in demand that it was sold for a sum of money equivalent to three thousand dollars in our coin.

This inflated popularity received an inconsiderable check about 400 B. C. At that time, Alcibiades pertinaciously refused to play the flute, affirming that the large mouthpiece would mar the contour of his lips. As he was pre-eminent in the political and fashionable world of the day, his decision was universally accepted and all the influential people thrust the flute into the discard. However, an ingenious worker surmounted the objection by making a smaller mouthpiece, causing Alcibiades to lift his ban and the popular favor was resumed where it had been so summarily broken off.

In Sparta, the flute led the chorus and was a military instrument, although, naturally, these people did not take kindly to the study of music as an art. In some Ionian cities, the human victims were led to the sacrifice or to execution accompanied by the strains of the flute. This dead march, known as "Nome of Keadias," was peculiarly weird and depressing in effect, thus being singularly appropriate to the occasion. In Rome, however, the instrument became a favorite, being known as the "Tibia," deriving its name from that of the shin bone from which it was constructed.

The ancients were handicapped for want of an invention which has been of inestimable value to us—keys. These are primarily a simple system of leverage making it possible to bring under control holes in the instrument quite out of reach of the average five fingers. This noteworthy improvement was due to the skill of Theobald Boehm, who worked untiringly between 1832 and 1847, until he had developed and perfected his clever invention.

The flute found small favor with the older composers. Doubtless this was due to the fact that they did not have the modern Boehm flute. They were annoyed to find that the performer on the flute was frequently playing in a different key from the orchestra. Cherubini voices his rancor against the instrument by saying: "The only thing in the world that is worse than one flute is two." But it is fortunate that the more modern masters did not share his aversion. A solo passage in Beethoven's "Leonora Overture" is especially beautiful and famed everywhere. Mendelssohn looked upon the flute and its possibilities with an appreciation little short of adoration, and introduced it with prodigal profusion throughout his music. His obligato in the quartet, "O Rest in the Lord," from the oratorio of Elijah is exquisite. Berlioz and Tchaikowsky both played the flute and their compositions are enriched by many melodies for this instrument.

From its earliest inception, there have been two varieties of the flute; one played by blowing into one end, consequently held directly in front of the musician, and the other made to sound by blowing into holes in one side. The former is known as the "Flute à bec," meaning "Flute with a beak"; while the latter is called the "Flauto Tranverso" or "Flute played crossways."

A good embouchure is absolutely essential to artistic flute playing. Also, the fingers must be raised at equal height and not be elevated above a certain point. The practical range of the instrument is from middle D up to C in alt, but occasionally Wagner has written for Db and Eb.

At the present time, the flute is in constant demand in orchestras, one of its functions being to double with the first violins in playing the melody. It also serves as a soprano instrument of the wood-wind group. But, as it possesses far more agility than its wood-wind relatives, it is much more adaptable than they for solo purposes.

Votichenko at Maxine Elliott Theatre.

Sacha Votichenko, the Russian composer and virtuoso of the tympanon, introduced a new type of entertainment when he presented intimate concerts of unusual music in his beautiful studio at the Hotel des Artistes. But, owing to the lack of space, many have been unable to gain admittance to the studio concerts in times past. To obviate this, Votichenko will give a recital of old and modern music at the Maxine Elliott Theatre on February 23. Several of his own compositions will be played for the first time upon this occasion. Eva Gauthier and other prominent artists will also be heard.

Sol Klein Is Leader for Marcus Loew.

Marcus Loew has taken over the Burland Theatre in the Bronx, formerly operated and owned by D. V. Picker. This theatre is the largest in that part of New York and draws a fine clientele.

Mr. Loew evidently found the musical programs to be satisfactory, for he took over the orchestra with the theatre. Mr. Sol Klein is in charge and has demonstrated his efficiency many times when difficult musical situations have arisen in the features.

For four years, Mr. Klein has had the responsibility of the musicians in the various theatres controlled by Mr. Picker. At one time, the musical programs for five theatres were his to arrange. His music has always pleased his public and he has become a prime favorite in the Bronx. We extend our congratulations upon his new appointment and our best wishes for success.

"When I Come Back to You" Timely.

This popular song by Frank H. Grey and J. Will Callahan is the leading ballad of the day, and is now being featured in vaudeville. It has been recently accepted as one of the official songs of the Y. M. C. A. The Y. M. C. A. musical director, Marshall Bartholomew, recently sailed for France with two hundred slides and copies of the song, to be taught to the boys in the American army still "Over There." This song has been accepted by every leading talking machine company, and will soon be on the market in record form.

A special orchestral arrangement is being issued by the publishers, Huntzinger & Dilworth.

New Atmospherically Japanese Music.

"Nipponesc," the Japanese Dramatic Themes, written for Sessue Hayakawa by Joseph O'Sullivan, Director of Music Service for Mutual, is being published by the Carl Fischer Music Publishing Co. of New York. Orchestrations, both full and small, will be available at an early date.

The piano transcription of two movements of this theme was used as a special insert with the press-book issued by Mutual on "His Birthright," the first Hayakawa production released through Mutual. That this service was appreciated by exhibitors throughout the country was evidenced by the numerous letters received by Mutual requesting that orchestrations of the theme be sent.

On account of the lack of characteristic Japanese music of dramatic mood, these themes should be a welcome addition to the library of every orchestra leader making a sincere effort to interpret motion pictures.

Mr. O'Sullivan has just completed a "Japanese Elegy," scored for full orchestra, which will soon be off the press.

A Few Words From US.

Are you aware that "Music for the Pictures" is a department devoted to the artistic side of your program? Don't pass it by because it is in the center of the book. Its preferred position should indicate its relative importance.

Nothing is more talked about by your patrons than music. Nothing is more appreciated if good, reviled if it be poor. "Music for the Pictures" is devoted to the interests of all exhibitors and musical directors. It aims to help both and its mission is one of service. If we can help you make money by suggesting a musical program, the pleasure will be a gratifying reward.

Don't take our word for everything. We are not infallible. Give us an argument once in awhile. Hit hard and from the shoulder. We court constructive criticisms and promise that we won't strike back.

Music for the Picture

Conducted by GEORGE W. BEYNON

Keep All Your Popular Music! Some Day It Will Be Valuable

THERE is a cry throughout the realm of filmdom for new music. Orchestra leaders everywhere are scurrying from publisher to publisher, from music dealer to music dealer, looking for new material with which to fit pictures. The supply of contemporary selections is fast being used up; repetition is frowned upon and improvisations must be good else the patronage will complain.

A little computation will show the strain on the music libraries usually found in the picture theatres. A fair average is found to be seventy selections necessary to cover a show. For those theatres that change daily, four hundred and twenty numbers are needed in the week of six days. These picture houses are usually neighborhood houses where the same clientele pays admission every day and continued repetition of musical numbers become as obnoxious as the player piano next door which has a repertoire of but seven rolls.

New music is certainly needed and as the film industry expands, the need will become more urgent. It will be impossible to supply the demand from the shelves of the high class publisher. Much time is required to create and bring forth in printed form the melodies of composers. No publisher accepts everything that is presented to him. There are certain standards of art which must be maintained before he would consider affixing his name as sponsor for the effulgent effusion. He must see a possible market for the piece before he brings it forth and places it for sale on his counters. The composer must come well recommended through performance or hearsay before he may expect to gain audience with the publisher, for the latter is a busy man and cannot see every would-be Wagner.

Americans are being taught to conserve and become thrifty, a trait that we have never been accused of before. The war has taught many lessons of self-denial that will bear rich fruit in the future. The expansion of the film industry places upon the owners of picture music libraries a duty that cannot with wisdom be overlooked. Keep your popular music hits.

How many times has there been a scene that called for "Sweet Sixteen" and you had to play something else because it was not available? Many times you could have used "Hiawatha" or "Tiger Lily." How many libraries contain "Bluebell," "On The Sidewalks of New York," "Bedelia," "East Side West Side," and "Good Old Summer Time?" Even "Alexander's Rag Time Band" is seldom heard in orchestras. "School-days" by Edwards, is a number that should be in every picture library, but the plates have been broken and only a few fortunate ones have a copy.

"Last Night Was the End of the World" has a significance—in spite of its long title—that constantly arises in features. "In the Garden of My Heart," "My Little Dream Girl," "Can't You Hear Me Calling, Caroline" and "Jingle Bells" all have a meaning that has been firmly established, and which may be used to good purpose in picture fitting.

When the publishers send you music, don't throw it away. Try it over and classify it according to atmosphere or emotion. A number once rejected frequently becomes the hit of the season and because it doesn't appeal to one is no reason for destroying it. File away these popular song orchestrations. They have big possibilities as themes even if they never become popular.

Then popularity makes them an invaluable asset to a library. While a song is popular use it as much as possible. When the people tire of it, and in their fickleness look for new tone sensations, file the "hit" away for future use. After a quiet sleep among the dusty folios of passe numbers, it will come forth again to fit a scene that nothing could so well fit, and be welcomed by the auditors as heartily as an old and tried friend returned from a long journey.

David Mendoza, Violinist, at Rivoli.

William Faversham made his debut as a screen actor at the Rivoli during the week of Jan. 12th. "The Silver King," one of the Paramount features, was his vehicle.

In the early portion of the picture, the music was appropriate but as the interest increased, the suitability decreased in exact ratio. When the climax came and the murderer was exposed, with the people sitting up and taking particular notice, the music petered out almost entirely and only a few strings kept up a desultory scratching.

The Second Hungarian Rhapsody by Liszt was well played. Mr. Rapee conducted and drew from the musicians a fine round tone in keeping with the gravity of the number. The results accomplished were somewhat remarkable because Mr. Rapee still uses his "short arm" and elbow movement. The Czimbalo solo was played by Bela Nyary, in his usual fine manner.

Miss Gladys Rice, the "popular" soprano, rendered "The Rosary," accompanied by organ and harp. The stage setting was the work of John Wenger. We liked the stage setting.

The best part of the musical program was the violin solo, Meditation from "Thais," played by David Mendoza, concertmaster of the Rivoli Orchestra.

Without any affectation or temperamental outburst, he got right down to business and played with that artistic touch seldom heard outside a concert hall. His intonation, his beautiful bowing, and his interpretation showed a propensity for deep thinking. His presence has made a great improvement in the general ensemble of the orchestra.

There was also an entr'acte when the orchestra offered selections from "The Three Twins" by Hoschna. We make no comment. Joseph Klein officiated at the conductor's desk and that is always sufficient guarantee of a fine performance.

Synchrony is still strong in the work of picture fitting at the Rivoli. More power to it. During the Pictorial, there arose some tricky flashes, showing soldiers from Belgium, France, Scotland and America. The scenes were very short and the average musical director would have selected a march to run through and cover them all. Not so in the Rivoli. Each scene was perfectly fitted atmospherically and synchronously.

Good Musical Scores Strongly Favored.

Another prominent orchestra leader has come forward strongly in favor of musical scores, and we feel that his letter should be given verbatim in order that exhibitors may know of the growing enthusiasm for this class of music service:

Plaza Theatre,
Madison Avenue and 59th Street,
New York City, N. Y.

My dear Mr. Beynon:

Permit me to say a few words on the subject of the musical score for Martin Johnson's "Cannibals of the South Seas."

In my opinion, this is a most difficult kind of picture to set to music. I am frank to say that I would have been at a loss but for the score.

The audience here at the Plaza responded with frequent applause, and it is my belief that their enjoyment of the picture was greatly enhanced by the excellent musical interpretation.

The labors of the painstaking director would be greatly lightened if scores of such excellence were furnished with every feature. The results in better music would be reflected in the success of the particular feature in each instance.

Very truly yours,

EUGENE CONTE.

Mr. Conte is an experienced musician with a large library. He is most particular in his choice of good music and welcomes any help from the producer that will tend to enrich his presentation of the picture.

Musical scores do not insult the intelligence of the leader, but are provided to help him. He may change a number here or there if his judgment of the musical requirements of a scene does not coincide with that of the arranger. Nevertheless the score will save him hours of time and give a variety to his already well-worn program. Every exhibitor should personally test out the various forms of music service and demand from the producer that which he believes will best suit his purpose.

Trumpet Oldest Brass Wind Instrument.

Through an authentic history dating back over two thousand years before Christ, the trumpet has been intimately associated with Chinese life. It also occupied a prominent place in the royal life of ancient Egypt, and the Hebrew prophets were familiar with its use, as it assumed a leading role in the downfall of Jericho. Greece possessed it at the time of the Trojan war and it flourished with chivalry in medieval history.

The Court of Henry VIII of England had practically the first approach to our modern band. This musical aggregation consisted of fourteen trumpets, ten trombones, two viols, three rebecs, one bagpipe, four tambourines and four drums.

The great popularity of the trumpet led to the formation of a "Trumpeters' Guild," which society contained members of the highest rank and came to be recognized as the oldest musical union. This guild existed down to the beginning of the nineteenth century. The membership was confined to the nobility and each person was compelled to undergo a rigid test of his ability as a trumpet player before his application for membership received any consideration.

The Lituus, one of the ancestors of our modern trumpet, vanished with the Roman Empire. But its successor, the cavalry instrument of the fifteenth and succeeding centuries, was evolved from the straight Busine. Judging from paintings of the period, the Busines were not all made with the same caliber bore, some having the wider bore of the trombone. They abound in illustrations of the fourteenth century and were used by trumpeters afoot and on horseback and as instruments of angels and heralds. Fra Angelico painted angels holding trumpets either with straight or zigzag tubes, the shortest being fully five feet in length. These are considered authentic as to size.

The ancient trumpets were formed of one piece only and could not by any possibility be adjusted to any variety of pitch. Consequently they were difficult to associate with other instruments. The credit of having bent the tube of the trumpet into three parallel branches creating its modern form has been attributed to a Frenchman named Maurin. But the transformation was really made much earlier, probably in Northern Italy. The first marked improvement occurred in the eighteenth century. This resulted in a practical mouthpiece, the invention of Meyer, of Hamburg. In 1780 Wogel added tubes by which the trumpet could be played in tune with other instruments. Wiedenger, the court trumpeter in Vienna, added stops in 1801. These were so placed that it was possible to reach two octaves in the chromatic scale. But the trumpet did not assume the form with which we are conversant until Sattler of Leipzig invented the first keyed trumpet.

The scores of Bach and Haendel frequently called for many trumpets. In their time it was necessary to employ a number of trumpets of different sizes, as one could not play all the notes required.

At one period in the life of the trumpet there were three varieties of the instrument: the natural trumpet, in which the length and pitch were varied by means of crooks; the valve trumpet, in which the desired results were acquired by the use of piston valves; and the slide and double-slide trumpets, like the trombone. The first and third are practically obsolete, the valve trumpet being the one universally used.

The trumpet, like the clarinet, cornet and French horn, is a transposing instrument; and, in the work of the old masters, the key signature was not used. But modern arrangers score the trumpet like the cornet and have recourse to key signature. This instrument is distinguished from the cornet in length of bore and quality, although they are similar in shape. The cornet is gradually ousting the trumpet as an orchestral and band instrument, as its execution is by far easier and the results obtained are practically as good. The slight difference between the trumpet and the trombone is due to wider bore of the latter. In playing the trumpet the performer's lips vibrate against the mouthpiece at a speed governed by the length of the tube, the pressure of the breath and the firmness of the embouchure. Firm lips and hard blowing produce the highest harmonics.

"Kisses" Used in "Wanted For Murder."

It does not require imagination to appreciate "Kisses" as a theme for Elaine Hammerstein. But it is something of a shock to find it associated with even this dainty star in a picture entitled "Wanted for Murder." However, "what's in a name?" This Harry Rapf feature is a romance, with war and its grim atmosphere well in the background. It is being booked by the Independent Sales Company and they are to be congratulated upon the choice of this song which brings out the desired contrast so effectively and presents a startling publicity angle at the same time. The ballad, written by Lynn Cowan and published by McCarthy & Fisher, is extremely popular and its association with this remarkably successful picture, "Wanted for Murder," will serve to add to its laurels.

Score for "Woman" by Dr. Riesenfeld.

Exhibitors are offered remarkable opportunities in the exploitation of the musical angle of Maurice Tourneur's epic production, "Woman," which depicts the evolution of femininity throughout the ages.

When "Woman" was given its premiere at the Rivoli Theatre some time ago, Director General S. L. Rothapfel had a special and elaborate musical score prepared for the production by his musical director, Hugo Riesenfeld. Arrangements were immediately made to have this musical score obtainable for exhibitors throughout the country.

This musical score, unusually ambitious even in these days of de luxe musical settings, was highly praised by the New York newspaper critics when they enthusiastically welcomed this production as the most artistic screen offering of the year.

It is interesting to note that Dr. Riesenfeld, who built the score, has just succeeded Mr. Rothapfel as managing director of the Rivoli and Rialto theatres. This fact gives the score extraordinary interest.

Several New Witmark Song Successes.

Few songs with an oriental flavor have more to commend them than "My Persian Pearl." It is easy but unusually effective and a fine number for costume effects and great for a double.

"That Wonderful Mother of Mine," by Hager & Goodwin, is a splendid mother song in every sense. It has a remarkably strong appeal and is fast becoming a great vaudeville favorite.

A number that combines excellent advice with a snappy lyric is "Have a Smile for Everyone You Meet and They Will Have a Smile for You." It is one of the most acceptable of the new popular songs and Witmark & Sons, who are the publishers of all three songs, believe that it will have a long run of popularity.

Expert Film Man in Organ Business.

There has been, during the past few years, an almost phenomenal forward stride in picture music. Men who formerly were successful exchange men and producers are among those who are turning their attention to the musical end of the business.

Prominent among the former is J. D. Wheelan of Dallas, Texas. This gentleman was a pioneer in the film business in Texas, having conducted an exchange before the day of the Patents Company. Later he handled the business of this company until it took over the state rights when Mr. Wheelan opened Mutual offices throughout the South. He was also interested in the Paramount for a time.

Being in such intimate touch with the film business for so long a time, Mr. Wheelan appreciated the vast possibilities of picture music. Feeling that the musical field offered excellent opportunities in a business way, he disposed of his other interests and devoted his attention to musical instruments.

Mr. Wheelan carries picture theatre organs, including the Seeburg and American Fotoplayer. He is sole owner of his business and has already built up a business reputation which should be a source of much satisfaction.

More Appreciation Needed for American Music.

According to the International Musician, the Globe-Democrat of St. Louis has come out strongly for American music. It enthuases over the remarks made on the subject by Glenn Dillon Gunn, conductor of the American Symphony Orchestra of Chicago. In part, Mr. Gunn says: "It was somewhat of a surprise to read, in a headline that 'The American is a timid soul,' until investigation proved that the characterization was confined only to our quality of courage in musical composition."

Director Gunn goes on to prove the truth of his statement by enumerating our many acts of subservience to European ideas of musical composition. He stated that there were many cases on record where American composers had consented to have their work submitted to European revision and criticism. The Italians resent any French or German attempts to dominate their national music and the same attitude is assumed by the other European musicians regarding their neighbors, for each has a natural pride in its own standards.

It would appear that the time is ripe for us to assert our national rights and acquire faith in our ability without help or interference from abroad. Already people are conscious of the fact that there are good music teachers in this country and the idea that one has to live abroad to get into the true atmosphere of music has long since been exploded. Of the musicians who have succeeded through foreign study, we hear much. Of the many who have starved or fallen by the way side there is no public record. The wonder is not that we have failed to develop high national standards of music but that we possess any music of worth while laboring under such a depressing handicap. The war has wrought many changes. One of them is the undeniable fact that we have learned to know our ability. There is a spirit abroad among us which can be expressed in great music. The consensus of opinion is that the next decade will witness a growth of American music that will rank favorably with the old masters.

Conducted by GEORGE W. BEYNON

What Your Department Has Done in the Twelvemonth That Has Passed

THIS is the first anniversary of "Music for the Pictures" under the present editor, and we feel that you will require the annual report of your department.

On February 2, 1918, we began this department in a small way, covering two pages of text and comprising an editorial, a few comments, Leader's Service Bureau and cue sheet synopsis. There was considerable interest elicited from the trade upon this new departure and favorable commendations acted as a spur to greater endeavor. During July and the early part of August there was more matter than space, and the department overflowed to the third page.

The issue of August 31 marked the birth of the enlarged department as now constituted, and its general "make-up" has received universal approbation. We are now running an editorial; an educational article dealing with the history of folk songs or musical instruments; comments on the musical phases of new pictures; a review of prominent theatre programs; four pages of cue sheets, classified in alphabetical order and right up to the minute; a Leader's Service Bureau, where questions are answered and suggestions offered, and an average of three pages of advertising.

It is with mingled emotions that we come before you at this time, for, although much has been accomplished in spite of uncertain and unsettled conditions, much more could have been done had the musicians given us greater moral and tangible support. Many have become regular readers of the "Moving Picture World"; many have sent in kind words of praise; while others have given us valuable news tips. We are thankful, but not satisfied. We want all the musicians in the country to regard "Music for the Pictures" as a department printed expressly for them, requiring their hearty co-operation and endorsement, and calling for the artistic help needed to elevate picture music.

The war is over. The unrest and doubt engendered by the draft is gone. Normal business conditions will soon become stable, then the musician can "tend to his knitting." Competition will be keener, and every leader must not only be equipped with a fine library, but must read about the ever-changing phases of the film industry. He must keep posted on the latest pictures and how they were presented musically to the trade. It is the object of this department to supply him with just such information. He wants to know whether a picture has a special score or not, or where the music suggested in various cue sheets is available. Again, he may turn to us for the needed information. This is his department, and we need his support to make it the success for which we all look.

It is with pleasure and a deep sense of appreciation that we extend our thanks to the exhibitors and producers who have taken so kindly to our efforts. The department aims to give the exhibitor every possible assistance in the enhancement of his musical program. His problems are close to our heart, and the "Leader's Service Bureau" has been instrumental in solving many a knotty situation arising in various theatres.

We point with pride to the advertising done by the organ manufacturers, music publishers and song writers. The moving picture field has been rather shunned by this type of advertisers in the past, but they are now awake to its vast possibilities, and seek customers among the picture players. For those wishing new music no better medium can be found than the advertising columns of this department. When the exhibitor needs an organ he can always get a line on this product in the "Moving Picture World." Advertising in this periodical means something. The fact that he is advertising with us is a guarantee of the reliability of the advertiser.

What the future holds no one may say, but the prospects are alluringly bright. We expect that this coming year will see a wonderful advancement in the musical standards of picture playing. It will be our pleasure to bend all our energies toward that end.

By keeping before them this important fact and the fundamental reason for the service, readers of these columns may, in no small way, contribute to the success of the department compiled and conducted for maximum benefit to the greatest number.

Improved Music at the Strand Theatre.

Many causes contribute to the noticeable improvement in the music at the Strand. In the first place the orchestra has been considerably augmented and a tuba fills out the brass section. There are three trombones where formerly only one prevailed, and the string section is not only increased in quantity, but better in quality. The difference was apparent in the rendition of Victor Herbert's "American Fantasie." We have heard it many times, but never before has it seemed so poignant in its delineation of Americanism.

Carl Edouarde conducted and brought from the score all that was ever put into it. At the close, when the "Star Spangled Banner" was played, no one in the large audience stood with reluctance. All were pleased to rise, not only for patriotic reasons, but out of respect for the splendid musical offering.

During the playing of the pictorial, we heard "Madelon," that famous French marching song, and it seemed good. The tempo of the various marches was much better than heretofore, and the change was appreciated. The key sequence was also more uniform, although there is still room for improvement in the synchronization of the various numbers. Especially fine in its suitability was the scherzo used during the aeroplane scene.

The Strand male quartette sang two popular numbers in a setting the equal of which we have never seen. First the strains of "There's a Long, Long Trail" came floating through the curtains, sung a capella; then as the song finished and the curtain rolled back, we beheld four soldiers standing in the bow of a real ship. While they sang Cohan's latest hit, "And They Will Come Back," the scene became more realistic because the waves lapped the vessel and in the distance, growing more and more distinct, was the Statue of Liberty. This wonderful setting more than made amends for the poor singing.

"The Fighting Roosevelts" was featured pictorially and musically. This musical setting stands pre-eminent among Strand presentations. No easy picture to fit at best, it was handled in a masterly manner, with a sure eye to the dominant idea of the revival and maintenance of the spirit of '76. The opening medley of American airs, the children's simple melodies and the light intermezzo in the early portion of the picture formed a fine beginning. Such characteristic and typical numbers as "There'll Be a Hot Time" and "Lead, Kindly Light" for Roosevelt and McKinley respectively touched the hearts of the older generation and received favorable comment. The music was well graded up to the climax, and the silent pause when McKinley declared war was most impressive and respectful. Perhaps the finish might be criticised by the thoughtless for its quietness, but those who know the art of picture fitting will rightly praise the manner in which this anti-climax was handled. The last impression left upon the patrons after they had seen the stirring life story of the greatest American and had listened to nothing but American music was that simple yet symbolic melody, "The Girl I Left Behind Me." No finer finish could be conceived.

A rather amusing fact concerning the Second Mazurka written by Godard comes to light. This well-known composition was written for a pharmacist to give as a premium with a certain brand of liquor, but was rejected because it was "too hard."

Trombone Recognized as Stateliest Brass Instrument

The most important member of the trumpet family is the trombone. The name comes from the Italian in which tromba, in one of its meanings, signifies trumpet. Although the trombone was a stranger in the orchestra until the nineteenth century, it is an extremely old instrument. The invention of the slide has been attributed to Tyrtæus in 635 B. C. It is a historical fact that one was unearthed from the ruins of Pompeii. By the end of the middle ages trombones were well established, particularly in Germany. Credit for the evolution of the trombone from its primitive state is given to Hans Neuschel, of Nuremberg, who was the most celebrated trombone maker and performer of the fifteenth century. By the sixteenth century the tromba was in demand in England, having been brought from Spain. In the latter country it was known as the "Sacabucho," which was easily Anglicized into "Sackbut."

Of all brass wind instruments the trombone has undergone the least changes. Modifications of the original model have been attempted, but with indifferent success. The greatest innovation was made at the end of the eighteenth century, when the tube of the bell was bent in a half circle above the head of the musician. This produced a bizarre effect, and resulted in great inconvenience, as the alteration in the proportional regularity of the bell affected the tone quality. The instrument soon reverted to type where it has since remained.

It is now a slender brass tube arranged in three parallel lines connected by two short curves and ending in a bell. In the middle section it is double, so the two outer sections slide upon the inner ones. There are seven distinct positions for this slide, and they must be learned. There is no guide, but the performer must be as proficient as the violinist. Naturally, the knowledge is only obtained by constant practice. There are three varieties of the instrument—the alto, tenor and bass. Formerly a soprano trombone obtained, which was introduced into Bach's Cantatas and in Mozart's Mass in C Minor, but has now disappeared from the musical world. The tenor trombone is the one used almost exclusively at the present time.

In military bands a valve trombone is sometimes used, which produces the scale by means of pistons instead of the slide. It is easier to play than its orchestral relative, and permits the performer more rapid execution. But these advantages are more than counterbalanced by an inferiority in tone coloring.

Trombones differ from other members of the brasswind family in being non-transposing. Hence, they sound the notes as written. The range is over two octaves, and the timbre is majestic and imposing, while it has sufficient power to dominate the entire orchestra. Being an instrument possessed of lofty dramatic power, it should be reserved as the interpreter of impressive passages in the music. Mozart appreciated this fact and used the instrument with discretion. In the "Magic Flute," he employed the trombone for the march of the priests and to accompany Sarastro, the High Priest.

Berlioz says: "The trombone, in my opinion, is the true chief of that race of wind instruments which I distinguish as epic instruments. It has all the deep and powerful accents of high musical poetry from the religious, calm and imposing, to the wild clamors of the orgy. The composer can make it shout like a choir of priests, threaten, lament, sound a dread flourish, or ring a funeral knell."

A Song Possessing the Power of Midas.

"Egyptland," the music of which is by James W. Casey and the lyrics by Bartley Costello, has just been transferred to F. J. A. Forster, of Chicago. But the composers still retain the rights for mechanical instruments and for piano copies.

It is said that the advance royalties on this song aggregate the largest amount ever paid on a song.

The publishers, the Echo Publishing Company, and the writers are to be congratulated, as this extremely popular song is their second hit within a year. "Hearts of the World," as the musical world knows, has been and is one of the biggest sellers on the market.

New Song Dedicated to Norma Talmadge.

A song entitled "Heart of Wetona," dedicated to Norma Talmadge and bearing an autographed picture of the Select star on the cover, is being brought out by Leo Feist, music publisher. Miss Talmadge's work in "The Heart of Wetona," her recent screen success, was the inspiration for the Indian lyrics by Sidney D. Mitchell and the music by Archie Gottler.

This is the third time that Miss Talmadge has had a song written in her honor. "San San," by Danny Nirella, was dedicated to her in recognition of her artistic work in "The Forbidden City."

"Heart of Wetona" will be placed on sale the last week of January. Orchestra leaders will be glad to take advantage of this opportunity of adding another Indian song to their libraries.

Home Coming Song for Our Soldier Boys.

When the American boys went away to war they marched to the strains of "Over There," and this song kept up the spirits of all loyal Americans during the trying times that followed.

Now that the boys are coming back, it is but fitting that they should be welcomed by a new song written in their honor. Appreciating this fact, "Then You'll Know You're Home" has just been published by Chappell & Company. The lyrics of this delightful ballad are by Gordon Johnstone and the music is by Jesse Winne.

The publishers say that the first edition was sold out within a week, and it is proving a worthy sequel to "Keep the Home Fires Burning," which was a tremendous success.

"Notes on Music in Old Boston."

While writing book reviews is no part of our province, a little booklet has come to us that demands some attention.

It is entitled "Notes on Music in Old Boston," and is put out by the Oliver Ditson Publishing Company and written by William Armes Fisher.

The book is attractively bound, printed on excellent paper and typed in a manner easy to read.

The opening chapter is a brief resume of the history of Boston Common, and is followed by articles on the introduction of singing and musical instruments in the Boston churches. Later, the history of the Oliver Ditson Company is given in an interesting manner, and many excellent cuts are introduced to show the growth of the business.

Alex Gerber Signs Up with Witmark.

The latest addition to the staff of lyric writers employed by M. Witmark & Sons is Alex Gerber, who has just signed up for a term of years with this house.

Mr. Gerber enlisted in 1917, and claims that he was the first song writer to join the colors. Among the best known of his popular successes are "You Can't Stop Me From Loving You," "At the Fountain of Youth," "Some Girls Do and Some Girls Don't," "Since Sarah Saw Theda Bara," "Don't Give Back My Wife to Me" and "He's Living the Life of Reilly."

Composers' Society Plans Many Suits

The decision of Judge Blodsoe, of the Federal Court in Los Angeles, Cal., recently in the case of the music publishing firms of Waterson, Berlin & Snyder against Chis. Tollefson, a motion picture theatre proprietor, is to be the basis of many suits at law which the Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers are contemplating bringing in the near future.

Tillefson, according to the evidence in the case, had performed in his theatre the song, "Joan of Arc, They Are Calling You," without having first obtained permission of the copyright owner. The judge in his decision awarded the publishers a judgment of $250 and an additional $100 for counsel fees.

This decision establishes the minimum assessment against the proprietor of any theatre, music hall, cabaret or other place of amusement where copyrighted music is performed for profit without first obtaining permission from the copyright owner.

It was formerly believed that $10 was the minimum fee which the copyright owner could collect for each infringement, but according to Judge Blodsoe's decision, not only can a substantial amount be collected, but counsel fees as well.

Music for the Picture

Conducted by GEORGE W. BEYNON

Through Evolution in Picture Music the Scenic Comes Into Its Own

THE musical setting for the feature has received some consideration since the inception of photoplays. The Pictorial Review, the Comedy and the Scenic were not deemed of sufficient importance to warrant anything more distinctive than a march, a two-step and a waltz. The music for the Scenic was last in the list, as far as musical requirements were concerned, and it received only a mediocre setting.

But these ideas are long since defunct, and what was considered "good enough" even six months ago is decidedly passee in this age of wonderful achievements in picture playing.

Scenics are divided into classes and, if educational subjects be regarded in the same category, there is to be covered a wide field that calls for a diversity of adaptable music. The tendency has been to shirk the responsibility found in Scenic setting; in many cases turning it over to the harassed organist. No field of film endeavor covers the wide range to be found in educational. There is the panorama of nature; zoological film; fishery scenes; industrial plants; foreign lands, their customs and points of interest; and many other varieties of educational subjects.

It has been the custom to portray all these by introducing a waltz as the accompaniment and regard the problem as well solved. Propositions so easy of solution are usually inaccurate and erroneous, as is the case in this instance.

A waltz as the accompaniment to the Scenic is just that—an accompaniment, and a poor one. It cannot knit the minds of the patrons to the panoramic beauties displayed, neither can it portray the atmosphere of the great outdoors. It usually speaks of love or sensuality, or has in it a touch of sadness. It may also depict joy, gladness or piquancy while many waltzes have been merely written to accompany the dance. Wherein do these emotions fit the grandeur of nature, the strength of towering mountains or the peaceful content of sylvan glades? Were these scenes found in a feature, the musical director would come in for grave censure should he attempt to play a waltz. Then, why expect the leopard to change his spots? If it cannot properly fit a nature scene in the feature, it surely cannot fit one thousand feet devoted entirely to nature.

By the same process of reasoning, the waltz cannot fit animal scenes, oriental cities, flower gardens, or any situation wherein no physical or mental emotion is called into play. Therefore, one is forced to admit that this form of music cannot with justification be further used as Scenic accompaniments.

What material is available? By a process of eliminating all the musical selections breathing emotion; all marches, one-steps and two-steps which in no way fit; and side-stepping waltzes of all kinds, there is but one class remaining. This class embodies all kinds of descriptive numbers but, unfortunately for picture players, it is somewhat limited in quantity. It owes its existence to those true musicians who, scorning the heart interest and disdaining the world's applause, have given to us gems of art, tone pictures. Just as Scenics are the reproductions of nature in animated form and closely allied to oil paintings, so descriptive pieces are musical landscape portraits.

For example, "Morning" by Grieg, is distinctively pastoral and paints the rising sun as clearly in tones of beauty as that seen from the artist's brush. It has the added advantage of length sufficient for a complete reel of nature in the early dawn. We have many pieces dealing with sheep and the shepherd watching them graze. Rushing streams and falling cascades are easily depicted while sluggish rivers and dark forests give little difficulty in setting.

Such selections as "A Shepherd's Tale" by Nevin, "Nymphs and Fauns" by Bemberg, "Birds and Bees" by Levy, and "Pastel Minuet" by Paradis, are musical gems that fit most perfectly the requirements of the Scenic. By going into Grand Opera fields, one finds such numbers as "Berceuse" from Jocelyn, "Siegfried's Idyll," "Tribut de Zamora" and others admirably suited to depict nature in its varied moods. For light breezy scenes, use "Murmuring Zephers" by Jensen, or "April Moods" by Eugene; while for big wind storms at the seashore, "Scotch Poem" by MacDowell is most appropriate. For bird life, why not play "The Magpie and the Parrot" by Bendix, "The Squirrel Parade" by Crosby, "Butterflies" by Steinke, "Dance of the Moths" by Weidt, "The Robin's Farewell" by Bendix? For distant lands, the selections should be chosen with a view to the characteristics of the countries shown. For India, oriental music; for Japan, Japanese music; or for Egypt, Egyptian music, would be the natural and should be the only selections chosen.

There is always some action even in Scenics, and this should be a guide for the tempo chosen. If the waves of the ocean quietly lave the feet of the crags and the Island of Malaita is shown in its noontide listlessness, it would spoil the picture to play a bright allegretto even though the music be most appropriate from the standpoint of atmosphere. The laziness and sense of ennui must be carried out musically to obtain the best results. On the other hand, when the business section, the wharfs and peopled streets of Tokio are shown, it would be a fallacy to attempt to fit the lively scene with an atmospheric andante. The activity of the Japanese calls for an equal degree of activity in the music.

The playing of the Scenic need not tax the mind of the musician to any appreciable extent. He has no cues to worry him, and his attention may be given over to the artistic rendition of his selection. This is one chance in the program given to the musician to show what he can do as a virtuoso. Many times has the writer heard the applause of the audience at the conclusion of a well played number during the Scenic.

As a rule, the Scenic runs for fifteen minutes. When the picture holds an idea in continuity, long numbers should be chosen so that "once through" will be enough. A selection that contains a motive suitable for the picture, reiterated and embellished by various instruments, is the kind to be sought.

Do not use two numbers when one will do, even if it be necessary to repeat it once. The association of ideas plays a large part in the fitting of scenes where no plot is given. Panoramas are very much alike on the screen and music alone can lend the required atmosphere as a distinguishing mark.

If the organist be required to play for this class of picture, he should follow the lines laid down for orchestra leaders. Too many organists merely strike chords containing little or no melody and the picture does not receive the stamp of individuality. There is always more lee-way given to the organ than to the orchestra for the former has a greater scope for changing its registrations and range.

Sometimes both organ and orchestra may be used to splendid advantage together and separately. In any case, the Scenic motive should be held and when the orchestra finishes and the organ picks up the accompaniment, the latter should continue playing that motive until the picture has been projected.

Cello, Violin and French Horn solos may be used most effectively in the playing of Scenics. Sometimes a solo instrument with a harp and organ accompaniment will bring results not to be obtained in any other way.

It is more vitally important to hold the atmosphere of the Scenic than to portray the action in the feature, for the latter speaks for itself while the former must be determined. The very fact that the program is selected to give variety for the patrons makes it imperative that the music should change with each picture and emphasize the ideas depicted in the various scenes.

Violin Remains Unchanged During Three Centuries

THE violin has a long lineage. It is thought to have had its inception in ancient Indian, but we date the instrument as we know it from the thirteenth century. During the last three hundred years it has remained practically unchanged. But it has witnessed many radical alterations in the world of musical instruments. Lutes, spinets and harpsichords have been relegated to history. There have been very appreciable improvements in the harp, and the piano has been given birth. But the violin made by Stradavari was so graceful in form and so lovely in tone that it has defied all attempts to improve it. However, the violin existed for one hundred years before the clever workmen of Cremona added their charmed touch and perfected the work already begun.

The troubadours, who were poets as well as musicians, played on instruments known either as violes or guitar fiddles. The body was pear-shaped and over it were stretched five strings. Sometimes the instrument was played by the fingers, by a crude bow or by a wheel attachment, which was a clumsy invention. Gradually, the box-like instrument was made larger and the sides were cut out, forming a waist. This was the first step toward the present-day violin. In the fifteenth century blocks were added. These were glued to the back and front and served to strengthen the instrument, and added much to the resonance.

At the beginning of the sixteenth century the violin began to assume its present form, but even yet the two carved openings or sound holes on either side of the bridge were not in place. These "F holes" were subjected to a great deal of experiment. At the time of the troubadours they occupied practically the same place as today. But subsequent workmen, believing that they weakened the instrument, discarded them entirely.

The center of the violin-making industry from 1560 to 1760 was in three little shops on a street in the Italian town of Cremona. There all the great violins of the world were made by Amati, Stradivari or Guarneri. The two latter were at one time apprentices of the former, but eventually Stradivari became the most celebrated of all violin makers, and his instruments are now as valuable as crown jewels. Stradavari's most comprehensive improvement consisted of lowering the height of the arch and altering this flattened curve to a more uniform shape so as to afford greater resistance to the pressure of the strings. When Amati died, he bequeathed all his tools to Stradivari. The latter is supposed to have put out over two thousand violins, making every detail of his instruments, even the pegs.

Until the invention of the modern bow there was no brilliant violin playing as we understand it in our time. The earliest model of bow was shaped like that from which the arrow is drawn, and it was extremely unwieldy and unsatisfactory. The first improvement was made in the thirteenth century, when the one end was made blunt and a hair was substituted for the cord formerly used. Corelli, the Italian composer and violinist, later used a straight bow, which was not at all elastic although it was made of very thin wood. It had a screw by which the hair could be regulated. But at the end of the eighteenth century Francois Tourte introduced the modern bow. His invention completely revolutionized violin playing. So until his day there was no real art of violin bowing, although Tartini wrote a book on it. The world was very slow to adopt Tourte's bow, and it remained for Paganini, the Italian violin wizard, to cause a furore for the method. He utilized every imaginable movement of the bow and developed a remarkable dexterity and flexibility of the wrist.

The strings of the violin are four in number, the lower being wound in wire to increase its weight. The range is from G below the treble stave up to A in alt, and all soloists and virtuosos go to C in alt and even to D, and Eb above that in rare instances.

Beyond doubt the violin is the most important instrument in the orchestra. The first violinist, or concert master—as he is called—is considered second only to the conductor in rank and importance.

Arthur Kay Directs Grauman's Music.

We all know Arthur, perhaps not by the name of Kay, but at least we know him, for he proved himself to be a fine conductor and a thorough musician while directing at the Lyric, in New York.

This talented young man is the musical director at the Grauman's Theatre, in Los Angeles, and has under his baton a fine orchestra of forty men. He has a very extensive library from which to work and two librarians aid him in his selections for the picture.

When we received the program, our Eastern sophistication was given a jolt. Such a fine aggregation was not expected in a theatre where top prices are 35 cents in the evening and 25 cents at the matinee. It is wonderful how the large orchestras are springing up all over the country. The musical influence for good has far-reaching possibilities.

Our curiosity has been aroused by the name of the second organist. Jesse J. Crawford we know by reputation, but will some kindly disposed soul tell us who C. Sharp Minor is? Can it perchance be the "nom de organ" of some great organist who wishes to conceal his identity in key signatures? Could he be a young man whom the law regards as a sharp-seeing minor or is he related to the famous Bach fugue? Then again there might be a possibility that inasmuch as C sharp minor is enharmonically B minor, he did not want to be minor because of its stigmatic allusions. Whether he be minor or major the question is paramount in our mind. Who is he? With a name like that he must be a wonderful organist.

Joking aside, we are delighted with the musical program offered at Grauman's and take this belated opportunity of expressing our good wishes for its success.

Count Tolstoy to Be Heard in Recital.

A talk on "The Significance of Music in Russian Life" will be given by Count Ilya Tolstoy, son of the great Russian author, Count Leo Tolstoy, at Sacha Votichenko's Musical Concert at the Maxine Elliott Theatre, on February 23. Two of Votichenko's compositions, "March Slave" and the "Battle Hymn of Free Poland," dedicated to Madame Olga Petrova, the Polish star, will be heard on this occasion.

Yeggmen Visit the Rivoli Theatre.

The art of picture presentation having become a science has naturally developed a quota of rules and a few fundamental principles. These usually act as a guide to the blase critic, but the performance given at the Rivoli during the week of January 26 made criticism an exceedingly difficult task.

Opening with the Raymond Overture, superbly played under the direction of Erno Rapee, until the organ solo closed the bill with "Fanfare," things went so smoothly and so unobtrusively that we could find little fault—not that fault-finding is our particular vocation.

Bird Island, the scenic, was atmospherically held by the playing of some light fantastic selections suitable in every respect and in keeping with the flying fowl and salty sea. Here synchrony prevailed as usual, and the closing of the picture brought to an end the pretty music.

Mr. James Harrod, a tenor of somewhat remarkable ability, sang that old Scotch folk song, "Bonnie Sweet Bessie." His voice is pure in quality and particularly sweet. He has a fine mezzo voce, which he uses with telling effect in his top register. The song was well interpreted and merited a better accompaniment than was given by the orchestra. There is only one fault in his work and that is a closing of the eyes while singing upper tones—a mannerism much affected by church singers, but which detracts from concert work.

The usual excellent setting was given to the Pictorial Review, and especially noticeable and effective was the imitation of a "Merry-go-round," performed by the drummer with the aid of scaled whistles. Another innovation was the use of a piano string accompaniment only during a scene showing aeroplanes at bomb practice. Evidently the upper part of the grand piano had been thrown back and the fingers of the pianist kept up a continuous light scratching of the strings. Try this on your piano and you may readily imagine the flight of aeroplanes.

As a symbolic prelude for the feature with Clara Kimball Young in "Cheating Cheaters," there was staged the "Dance of the Yeggman," accompanied by the theme of the picture, "My Name Is Jimmy Valentine." The house was darkened. Suddenly, a spotlight appeared and flitted about, flashing everywhere, symbolic of the flash light. The curtain was drawn and a darkened stage was shown with a safe at one side. Enter the yeggmen, with flash lights, masks, and all the paraphernalia of their trade. They gave the characteristic dance. The idea was beautifully worked out in detail and prepared the audience for what was to follow.

The feature was given the usual excellent setting, and the program closed with a comedy and the organ solo.

It was a pleasing show, well presented, and carried the dignity always to be found at the Rivoli performances.

Some Numbers Are Peculiarly Inspired.

The well known orchestral numbers, "Meditation," "Springtime" and "Reverie," all by George Drumm, were suggested and inspired by—cherchez la femme—no wonder they are popular numbers among the handsome musical directors.

Music for the Picture

Conducted by GEORGE W. BEYNON

Herbert Lubin Gives Views on Appropriate Musical Settings

IN KEEPING with the elaborate campaign along the lines of advertising and publicity which has been prepared by the newly formed S-L Organization for the purpose of giving the proper presentation to the inaugural feature starring E. K. Lincoln and directed by Ralph Ince, Arthur H. Sawyer and Herbert Lubin have decided to provide the picture with a musical setting of like magnitude. Messrs. Sawyer and Lubin are firm believers in real service to the exhibitor. They are of the opinion that every possible aid in the way of exploitation and advertising should accompany the special productions which go to the exhibitor, in order that the showmen may give specially important productions the presentation they deserve. They also believe that the matter of appropriate musical settings has been sadly overlooked by many producers who feel that after they have supplied the exhibitor with a full line of advertising services, every obligation to him is fulfilled. In speaking of effective and appropriate musical scores for feature productions recently, Herbert Lubin said:

"In producing the Ralph Ince Film attraction, which will inaugurate a series of special vehicles presenting E. K. Lincoln as star under the personal direction of Ralph Ince, we have been particularly careful not to overlook the value of effective musical settings to accompany the picture. Before the story of the first S-L feature was placed in production by Mr. Ince, the scenario was painstakingly gone over by Mr. Ince and a well-known composer, with the view in mind of seeing whether several special points in the film could be so handled by Mr. Ince as to fit in exactly with the ideas of the composer who will prepare the score. This plan has worked out admirably, particularly in connection with several of the big physical punches which dominate the E. K. Lincoln vehicle. The composer has had the advantage of suggesting certain things to be incorporated in the picture so that he might secure impressive musical effects at the proper points. We believe that we are offering to the exhibitors of this country a production of great magnitude and extraordinary entertainment value, and it is our intention to help them in the proper presentation of the film by supplying an adequate and appropriate musical setting. Keeping always in mind the fact that the first run motion picture theatres differ greatly in their requirements as to music from exhibitors of smaller calibre, the musical score for our first production will be so arranged as to be adaptable to the needs of all exhibitors. The music, which we have in course of preparation, will greatly enhance the entertainment value of the first S-L production and above all the music will be appropriate in every respect to every episode in the film."

In conference with Mr. Conrad Miliken, Mr. Ralph Ince, Mr. Lubin and Mr. Bert Ennis, the composer has had an opportunity of obtaining the most minute details of interpretation to be found in this wonderful picture. Melody will be the key of the score and in the majority of cases these melodies will be well known. Great care has been taken to suitably adapt every situation and where no suitable music is available original motives have been written especially for certain scenes, the musical requirements of which call for superb artistry.

The usual method of providing a musical score service has been that of supplying the needs of the bigger theatres and allowing the little fellow to make the best he can of a score written for a symphony orchestra. The S-L Organization are reversing the process by giving out a musical score that may be played by any combination of from one to fifty musicians. There will be organ and piano solo parts in simplified form and the violin and cello books will be plentifully cued with the solos of other instruments. No one will have difficulty in musically interpreting the picture with this score. The entire service is primarily prepared in order that every theatre can, and may, use it for the proper presentation of this fine feature.

Both Directors Should Work Together.

To prevent the silly and defective musical scenes found so frequently in pictures and to obviate the faulty suggestions offered in cue sheets, the music and picture directors should closely co-operate, and collaborate upon each feature. Pitiful mistakes are seen in the direction of certain musical scenes which could be readily corrected if the musical director was called into consultation. Inaccuracies occur continually in cue sheets because the arranger fails to confer with the picture director.

Recently our worthy musical contemporary, Mr. S. M. Berg, pointedly and pugnaciously called the attention of the producers to some intolerable and glaring musical defects in staging atmospheric scenes. His article and standpoint being well taken are worthy of consideration, for he has voiced the sentiments of nearly eighty thousand picture players and a host of music-loving patrons.

If an actor cannot ride, swim nor shoot, he is usually doubled with some one who can. Why not double the heroine who plays the piano with straight arms, stiff wrists and clawing hands? When a fellow plays the saxophone with his left hand above his right and fingers four keys at the same time, nobody but a fool will credit him as a player. A few words with the musical director would straighten out these incongruities.

In a certain feature of recent release, there was shown upon the screen a few bars of a popular song sung by some darkies. The lyrics beneath the music read, "Meet her and greet her with a smile." For some unaccountable reason, or through sheer negligence, the musical director, who arranged the cue sheet, used the words on the screen as the caption of the song and so indicated it in his cue sheet.

We personally wired the director of the picture and found it to be "The Sunshine of Virginia," published by Shapiro, Bernstein Company. Why didn't the cue sheet arranger get in touch with his picture director before issuing broadcast cue sheets that are misleading? The question of the suitability of selections is largely a matter of opinion and criticism becomes difficult, but when for a direct cue a number is suggested that does not exist, then it is high time that the musical director gets the script or the facts from the picture director.

Riesensfeld Conducts New Overture.

Fredrich Smetana has written many gloriously descriptive numbers, but few as exacting as "Vltava." This number describes the river of the same name in Bohemia and its rippling melodies brought out the idea to a nicety. Mr. Riesensfeld, the new managing director of the Rivoli-Rialto forces, presided at the conductor's desk and brought the house to its feet by his careful interpretation.

Without a break, the music proceeded into the scenic and pictorial review which opened with a pastoral scene showing mountains and streams. This was clever continuity, not only musically but atmospherically.

Anne Rosner sang "In Dreamland" by Herbert, not from choice evidently—for it ill suited her voice—but to introduce the picture "Don't Change Your Husband." Dreamland might just as well have been the title of the feature and no better preparation could have been obtained than the sentiment expressed in the song.

Three special effects marked the playing of the feature, namely: An imitation of a ukelele accompaniment which was poorly portrayed; a Victrola record played to synchronize with a talking machine scene; and the playing of a direct cue "Forgotten." The entire feature received a meritorious setting.

The comedy and organ solo completed the program at the Rialto given during the week commencing Feb. 2.

The Cornet an Offspring of the Old Post Horn

The word "Cornet" in its literal sense means "Little Horn," and was formerly used to designate a reed instrument of the oboe family having a conical bore terminating without a bell. But this instrument is long since obsolete and the term is now alone associated with the brass instrument of the trumpet class, being a hybrid intermediate between the French horn, trumpet and bugle.

At the beginning of the nineteenth century, the cornet was evolved from the old post horn. This feat was accomplished in Germany by the introduction of pistons and a modification of the horn outline. The instrument never found much favor in the land of its nativity, but was adopted in England and France in 1830.

Its characteristic feature consists of the three pistons which may be pressed down singly by twos or all together to increase its compass. The first lowers the pitch a tone; the second, a semitone; and the third, three semitones. The instrument has the same pitch as the trumpet, although the mouth piece is larger and there are no fixed notes as in instruments having lateral holes or those furnished with keys. The musical scale is obtained by the performer through his ability to produce notes by overblowing. The intermediate notes completing the chromatic scale are obtained by means of three pistons which, upon being depressed, open valves leading into supplementary wind ways which lengthen the original tube. Formerly there were two kinds of cornets known as Bb and Ab instruments, deriving their names from two shanks which were interchangeable. The new "Victor" cornet, put out by C. G. Conn, Elkhart, Ind., has a small wheel which enables one to tune the instrument to the finest degree with the assurance that it will remain where placed. It also has extra compensating tubes which permit the player to sound every note in time in any key without having to humor certain notes with the lips in order to obtain them strictly in tune, as is the case with the ordinary instrument. These instruments are justly famed and have the endorsement of eminent cornetists the world over.

In England, music for the cornet is usually written for the instrument as sounded, but in France, Germany and this country, composers score for it as for a transposing instrument and the music must be written for it above the key as it transposes downward. Its compass is naturally two octaves and three tones. But it is essentially a band instrument, and as all these are scored either in Bb or Eb, the Bb cornet is regarded as C.

The timbre of the cornet is between the horn and the trumpet. The tone color is not to be compared with the trumpet as the brilliant, noble sonority of the trumpet is lacking and, unless in the hands of a skilled musician, the cornet tone has a proneness to be coarse and blattant. The tendency to crowd the trumpet out of the orchestra by the substitution of cornets is regrettable, for, while the latter is bright in tone and an agile instrument with great technical possibilities, its sound is hard and commonplace and more suited to military music than for serious concerted works. From the performer's viewpoint, it is superior to the trumpet, for it is played with great facility, its mechanism is simple and little fatigue is caused the musician. But as a musical instrument intended to convey lofty ideals, the cornet has no possibilities and is never taken seriously by the master composers.

George Drumm, Composer, Offers "Reverie," His Latest

The Irish are a fighting race, known throughout the ages for their pugnacity and steadfastness of purpose. They will not be kept down and they strive to gain the heights of their ambitions through constant efforts, conscientiously made.

Some of the race from the Emerald Isle come to New York to be policemen and, begorra, they make good ones at that. But George Drumm (no middle name), the months as a practical musician, Mr. Drumm was given the charge of a large orchestra in the Regent Theatre in Paterson. There he developed a fine sense of picture fitness and gave a musical program that was the talk of the state.

Naturally energetic, he found time to compose some of the finest orchestral selections of the day. "Meditation" was his first piece, and after being played by the Strand orchestra in manuscript form, was rejected by many publishers as being a poor business proposition. Finally, G. Schirmer, Inc., took the number and its popularity forced them into four editions. It is recognized as one of the biggest selling orchestra numbers on the shelves of the dealers today.

"Springtime," a waltz intermezzo, and the "Rookies March" followed the first successful number and became almost as popular as the first. When America entered the war, Mr. Drumm brought out "Hail Columbia," a grand march with vocal chorus. Although not so popular because of its restricted use, "Hail Columbia" is known as one of the few good standard marches.

At present Mr. Drumm is working on a new number which he calls "Reverie" and which every orchestra leader will be glad to get. It is an andante movement written in his best style and promises to reach a greater popularity than that attained by any of his previous efforts.

In speaking of the call for new music among the picture players, Mr. Drumm said: "The time will never come when there will be sufficient music to meet the demands of the film industry. Music, as we now hear it in picture theatres, is generally good but has by no means reached its zenith. Its development has been gradual and must continue as the people become better acquainted with musical literature. No money should be spared on the music for a good picture and the miserly and niggardly attempts to cut down music appropriations will only tend to lower the attendance at those theatres where such a shortsighted policy prevails."

As Mr. Drumm is a student of harmony and theory, an accomplished player of the violin, viola and harp, and a member of the Royal Irish Academy of Music in Dublin, he knows his subject well. The future should hold splendid possibilities for him.

George Drumm.

well known musician, arrived in America to show us what an Irish band could do working in concert.

As Mr. Drumm was the bandmaster of Ireland's Own Band, they couldn't leave him at home, and in 1904 this fine organization was brought to the St. Louis exposition. Later, it toured the Eastern States giving band concerts which drew forth much praise for their merit. The band returned to Ireland minus a perfectly good conductor, for George decided that America offered greater opportunities than those afforded in the old country.

For some time Mr. Drumm conducted orchestras for P. G. Williams and B. F. Keith, later entering the field of picture players, when he became one of the members of the Strand orchestra. After some

Earnest Appeal for New Music Rolls

A letter recently received by us makes such a pertinent appeal that we are quoting from it, trusting it will reach the eyes of the parties most intimately concerned. It is from one of our subscribers, the owner of a moving picture house in Tasmania, New Zealand. The gentleman says in part:

"As a regular subscriber to the MOVING PICTURE WORLD, I notice that the makers of photoplay records do not advertise in your magazine. No doubt if you placed this proposition before them it would be to your advantage and it would be a boon to us who are compelled to use mechanical instruments."

In view of the fact that organs requiring rolls are being advertised and sold, it would seem that organ roll people should become awake to the possibilities of properly listing their rolls. A suggestion to the wise is usually sufficient.

Music for the Picture

Conducted by GEORGE W. BEYNON

Four Kings and a Queen of Hearts Should Stand Pat for Good Music

IT IS interesting to watch the evolutions and revolutions occurring daily in the picture industry. The many new angles that crop up, created by fertile brains and brought into existence through executive ability, keep the trade guessing.

The producer creates a star by strong publicity, widely heralding his or her histrionic ability. The face of the star becomes a box-office attraction and just when the producer figures that he is in a position to "cash in" on his investment, said star forms a company to make pictures on its own account.

Heading not the handwriting upon the wall, the producers are face to face with the biggest situation of this kind that has ever cropped out in the short life of the industry. Five of the biggest drawing cards, four kings and a queen, have decided to take the pot. Unless a misdeal can be declared or four aces suddenly appear, the game will be broken up for somebody.

What has all this to do with music? We do not hesitate in saying: "Everything." The development of music as a factor in the presentation and insurance of pictures has been wonderful. No exhibitor disregards his musical program with impunity. Patrons expect and demand the best in musical art. Special scores are written and much attention is given to the cue sheets distributed for the benefit of musical directors. Every effort is made to improve the music service.

First National Has the Deal.

The First National will offer to the exhibitor a combination of five big stars, and while their musical program has not been announced, we feel that no money will be spared to suitably present the marvelous pictures which will be forthcoming.

It is inconceivable that Chaplin, Pickford, Fairbanks, et al. will say, as some producers do—"We do not distribute music, we purvey pictures." The art of dramatic action and music are too closely allied to permit separation. The better the acting, the stronger should be the music. The opportunity for something new, something bigger and something more serviceable in the way of music is given to the United Artists' Association. This combination has the power that without loss of dignity can raise the standards of music to its highest traditions. Ideals may be maintained in the musical interpretation of its pictures as well as in their histrionic appeal.

Rothapfel Inaugurates New Idea.

A forward step has been taken by the Rothapfel Picture Corporation, S. L.

Rothapfel, president. It is the policy of this new company to issue six Rothapfel programs a year, each a complete entertainment, including a dramatic feature picture, comedy, scenic, and news and magazine films, together with "complete musical scores"—in other words, a form of "Road Show." Mr. Rothapfel has always stood for the best in music for the pictures and this new method of music distribution should revolutionize the service now being purveyed by the producers.

"Light Cavalry" Overture at Rivoli.

There are two ways of reviewing a performance: One, a mere recital of events; the other, a concrete, concise and constructive criticism of the program as a whole. Little is to be gained by simply telling the exhibitor or orchestra leader the items of interest in a bill, but frequently we have no option because some performances preclude anything further than comment.

The offering at the Rivoli during the week of Feb. 9 calls for more than comment. For all around excellence, few shows have been better. "Light Cavalry," that old favorite, was played as the overture. Contrary to popular belief and some excellent encyclopedias, according to the Rivoli program, Von Suppe was an Italian who lived in Vienna. His music naturally partakes of the German flavor, which, distasteful at this time, cannot be laid up against the composer. Erno Rappe conducted and with the assistance of the magnificent orchestra did full justice to the score.

The scenic received a beautiful musical setting played by the orchestra and later taken up by the organ. Professor Swinnen introduced a canonical number which typified the ever changing panorama. It was different and impressed itself upon the hearts of the people, who showed their appreciation by generous applause.

"Requiem" Sung by Choir of Four.

A mixed quartette rendered Verdi's "Requiem" as a tribute to the late Theodore Roosevelt. As the curtain rose, there stood out in bold and black relief a craped chancel, candles burning on either side, and white columns rearing their heads high into the "flies." Standing behind the dark altar, surpliced and in black cassocks, the quartette choir commenced to sing. Not a detail had been overlooked to make the setting solemn, sincere and spiritual.

Opening with the contralto solo, taking up the duet in all its intricacies, and continuing as a trio, the voices of the singers rang out in sacred and solemn tones. Then came the bass solo, well intoned by Manuel Liszt; the orchestra rose higher in volume, the three voices joined in and, with a mighty and sudden climax, came the end of the anthem. Not a sound came from the audience for at least thirty seconds, which in itself was the highest form of praise and appreciation.

No better sacred singing has been heard in New York anywhere for a long time. Personally, nothing has so delighted our ears and esthetic temperament as the singing of this "Requiem."

"Out of the Fog," a feature presenting Nazimova, was well treated musically. In some places, where the storm raged, mechanical effects alone interpreted the roaring of the sea. Elsewhere during the music, we heard the bell-buoy sounding its weird, uncanny tones, and Marche La Juive, by Halevy, was put to splendid use as a tension number.

The Spanish atmosphere was broken off too abruptly and the agitato which portrayed the stabbing of the mate continued too long into the ship scene and through the continued Spanish dance. This alone marred a perfect performance.

Joseph Klein conducted the vocal number with a keen appreciation of acoustical properties and at no time "forced" the singers. He also occupied the conductor's stand during the feature, giving his score a most conscientious reading. Mr. Klein plays to the picture. The screen is his score and according to the action there depicted, so goes the music. He is building on a solid rock and his growing reputation is enviable and highly commendable.

Call for Features with Music Scores.

There has arrived in our mail a letter indicative of the fast-growing demand for orchestral scores. It was written by William Hamilton, Director of Music, Community Motion Picture Bureau of New York City. Mr. Hamilton writes:

"I notice in your admirable columns of recent issue an advertisement of music scores, adaptations, etc., bearing your name. I would like to know if there is available, within your reach or mine, a complete list of all productions which have had such special musical treatment. I believe from your accurate knowledge of so many other matters that you are the person most likely to obtain such a list."

The mental apathy of music service is buried in the past. The day has dawned when the orchestra score enters very largely into the question of the advisability of using the picture. Producers must respond to the insistent demand. Leaders are expecting an adequate music service and will not be gainsaid. The film drama will still reach the heights of operatic tradition.

The Tone of the Tunes

The FOTOPlayer

Constant service demands an instrument built of selected woods and special metals to withstand climatic changes and preserve the refinement of tonal quality

"The Fotoplayer which we purchased from you a year ago has been of great benefit to our business and permitted us to raise the price of admission. We are pleased to say that we are doing satisfactory business, and if we had a dozen more theatres here in Philadelphia we would have a Fotoplayer in every one of them.

—Ideal Theatre, Philadelphia, Pa.

"Recently I have bought the Wigwam Theatre and wish to say that the Fotoplayer now in use there had a great influence on me as I would not try to operate a Motion Picture Theatre without one of your wonderful instruments."

—Wigwam Theatre, Los Angeles, Cal.

The FOTOPlayer has established its supremacy in the field of picture playing by its versatility of operation. Brilliant orchestral and full toned organ effects may be obtained by hand or roll playing.

The FOTOPlayer contains the patented double tracker device permitting an instant interchange of "sad and glad" music following accurately the theme and action of the screen story.

"From a psychological standpoint the Fotoplayer is the most human instrument made, and by simple guidance it conveys to the audience each and every meaning. In other words the silence of the screen is beautified by the charms of Fotoplayer music whether dramatic or light according to the character of the play."

—Strand Theatre, Chattanooga, Tenn.

"The Fotoplayer occupies a conspicuous place and I keep it in absolute perfect condition. Two rolls are used certain hours of the day, it is also played by a real organist and used as a background for a small orchestra during certain hours of the afternoon and evening."

—Bijou Theatre, Brunswick, Ga.

Music for the Picture

Conducted by GEORGE W. BEYNON

The Golden Chain of Music Service Binds Producer, Exhibitor and Patron

NEVER before in the short history of the film industry has music played so important a role. Somewhat relegated to the background, while photography, plot and action were being perfected, music now holds the attention of producer, exhibitor and patron.

The producer realizes that music service is as essentially a selling argument as publicity. He knows that the exhibitor not only wants it but demands it. Experience has taught the showman that the sounds which emanate from the front of his house, when properly attuned to the silent drama, bring a larger return to his cash coffers. When he pleases his patrons, due credit is given to the producer, and thus in chains of service are all three linked together.

Herman Heller, musical director of the California Theatre, San Francisco, is now giving "Sunday morning Symphony concerts," which are started before the regular "show." These are given at the usual theatre rates and include the standard performance at the same price. The orchestra comprises sixty-five members of fine calibre and the music offered, though not strictly symphonic, is of great merit. Such popular classics as "Masaniello Overture," Auber; "Gitanelle Suite," Lacombe; "Prelude," Rachmaninoff; and "Southern Rhapsody," Hosmer, are rendered for the benefit of the music-loving patrons.

The Tivoli Theatre immediately enlarged its orchestra and now has one of the finest in the country. The Garrick of Minneapolis, The Circle in Cincinnati, the Stanley in Philadelphia, are names that stand high in musical esteem. Then we have the five big theatres in New York where a special staff of musical experts prepare the accompaniment to the pictures.

Millions of dollars are invested in musicians and musical instruments for the purpose of properly portraying the picture, and the end is not yet. In fact, it is only the beginning. It is pioneer work. It is the first step in a broader musical education for the masses. It knits closer the allied arts of drama and music. It enriches picture values and delights the ear without detracting from the pleasures of the eye.

Our columns have been devoted to the interests of the exhibitor and his music, not superficially but conscientiously. We try to point the way to higher standards, call for closer attention to detail and elimination of all those clap-trap effects so irritating to the fastidious auditors. From our years of practical experience and experiment, we have given freely the help requested by those confronted with knotty musical problems. And now, more than ever, when competition becomes keener, we extend the right hand of fellowship, deeply inscribed with the motto "At Your Service."

For More Efficiency and Service.

How do you like our new way of printing the cue sheets? The form has been changed very little except in regard to position, and our motive for making the change is well-founded. Some of the musicians justly complained of the "break over" to the next column or page, claiming that the cue sheets were "Too drawn out."

We have put them in more concise form without sacrificing their effectiveness. By clipping horizontally, the leader may obtain any cue sheet required without destroying others; by further cutting in a perpendicular fashion along the line of time duration, he obtains a pocket edition of cues only, for his use while playing.

If you like the innovation, tell us about it. If you can improve upon it, let us have your suggestion.

"Pirates of Penzance" at the Strand.

During the week of February 9th, the Strand offered Geraldine Farrar in the Goldwyn feature, "Shadows." As usual, the program opened with an overture, "Selection from La Boheme." Reiser conducted and the orchestra managed to finish the number together. It was the first show of the evening and the "house was light," so it really didn't matter.

The Topical Review was carried through with the same break-neck speed that usually pertains when the Strand orchestra attempts to play marches. Synchrony depends upon a well-defined and prearranged tempo, so naturally the former was conspicuous by its absence.

The duet from Act II. of "The Pirates of Penzance," by Sullivan, was well staged and costumed. The tenor, Mr. Bold, has a fine voice, capable of better roles. The singers were well received and the innovation seemed to please the patrons. That is the real test. No matter how mediocre the critic may think the artist, if he appeals to the people, he is the right man in the right place.

The music for the feature started out in eloquent fashion and bespoke a fine setting. It was a good setting, but there was not enough of it and too much organ. The swiftly passing of flashbacks to and fro made part of the picture difficult to set, and the organ was the logical solution of the situation, but with such a magnificent orchestra available, people thought they were being cheated by too much organ.

Joseph Martel, a baritone, sang "The Kerry Dances," by Molloy, and the latest marching song hit, "Madelon." He sang both well, and his French is above criticism. His enunciation was clear, production pleasing, and he entered into the spirit of his songs with true enthusiasm which endeared him to his auditors.

The comedy and the organ solo closed the bill.

Hugo Riesenfeld Writes Musical Suite.

Hugo Riesenfeld, managing director of the Rialto-Rivoli theatres, inspired by experience, is writing a suite entitled "Film Salesman's Routine."

It opens with "the Approach," interpreted by the piping of the flute and fairy touches on the strings floating softly yet clearly over a background of distant rumbling on the drums which betokens the rising wind of "bunk." This motif rapidly develops into a storm of staccato with bells, kettle drums and certainly all the brasses. Then there is a cadence in which the "bunk" motif fades out, rapidly disappearing into a rest of a full measure which precedes the "bluff" motif as a lull precedes a storm.

The "bluff" breaks with rare violence, a shrieking of whistles; swift, menacing rolling of the drums; piercing notes from the strings; a perfect frenzy of trombones. The "bluff" phase swiftly passes and after a pause the dolorous "Supplication" motif rendered in violin solo, weepful and pleading is heard.

There are a number of closing measures under consideration: One, the exaltation which betokens "contracts signed," done with piccolo and violin, or the "cancellation exit," rendered on the tuba, the lowest of all instruments.

Organist Offered Services to Nation.

Warren Yates, the diminutive organist of the Regent Theatre in Paterson, called on us the other day to tell us that he had just returned from the trenches, "Somewhere in America." Warren is a likable little cuss and inquired for "new music." There being no such "animile," his question was soon answered and we probed for facts regarding his military career.

Our efforts were well rewarded, for we learned of a deep laid plot against the life of the German army. This plan to kill off the Hun was only frustrated by the premature peace proposals, and, like many other embryo heroes, he was cheated out of much glory by the armistice.

Warren had gathered together an army of big strapping fellows like himself, 5 feet 3 inches, in their respective stockinged feet, and it was his intention to obtain permission to lead them "over the top" after the Germans had eaten well. If properly timed, he assured us, the attack could not fail, for the enemy would laugh himself to death at their first appearance. We agree with him. Such bravery should merit the reward of leather medals.

Two Witmark Comedy Songs Presented.

M. Witmark & Sons have just issued a couple of real comedy songs. The first of these lively successes is "Up in Mabel's Room," written by Alex Gerber and Abner Silver. This song has nothing to do with a play of the same name recently produced, but was inspired by the funny possibilities that the title suggested. The verses are crowded with funny lines, and the tune is catchy and full of "Pep."

The other comedy number is one of Harry De Costa's best things. It is called "I've Got the Shimmee Blues," and is founded on the edict that has banned that particular dance. There is plenty of lugubrious comedy in this little song.

The War in Song.

BEGINNING about twenty-five years from now, magazines and "special feature" newspaper articles will be published on the songs of the Yankee soldiers in the great war. This is a safe prediction, since its was about that length of time after the civil war that writers began to treat of a similar subject; and many an article, and even book, has been written on the songs of that war.

The songs of the old war differed from those of the present one in that they reflected more different shades of feeling. Our war has been so short that there was not room for much more than one state of mind; the state of mind that is represented in "Over There." "Over There" was just as singable up to the very day of the armistice as it was when the soldiers began to cross the Atlantic. But the history of the four years of the civil war, with its hopes, disappointments, and renewed determination, can be traced in the varying themes of its songs. In the first year of the civil war such a song as "Tramp, Tramp, Tramp the Boys Are Marching," could not have been written; it needed the great losses of the North to bring it out.

"Over There" was surely the great song of this war, as "John Brown's Body" was of the other. George M. Cohan is entitled, not for the first time, to the credit of having his hand on the people's pulse, of being a real interpreter of their moods. "The Yanks are coming, the Yanks are coming, and we won't come home till it's over, over there," and the gay but threatening melody epitomized the whole struggle from the American viewpoint. Later Cohan struck another chord, "When You Come Back, and You Will Come Back, There's a Whole World Waiting for You," but here he only touched a phase. In the earlier song he struck the national note, as George F. Root struck it in the old war with his "Rally Round the Flag." Root, too, had his song of a single phase, "We are Coming, Father Abraham, Three Hundred Thousand More." We may call Cohan the Root of this war.

Next to Cohan must be placed Irving Berlin, with his "I Hate to Get Up," though he wrote others. The two catchiest lines, those which paraphrase the bugle call, were not original, having been used in the army long before he entered it; but it was he who made a song around them, a song that was sung all over the country by soldiers and civilians, sung in France, too. Ivor Novello's "Keep the Home Fires Burning" was written before the war, but is entitled to rank as a war song because it was adapted to the purpose; and the same may be said of Zo. Elliott's "There's a Long, Long Trail," which the soldiers across the water sang on their marches.

"Good-Bye, Broadway; Hello, France!" was first in the field, went well while it lasted, but was too commonplace to hold out. As popular a song as any was "Joan of Arc," which had two singular points about it. The author, Alfred Bryan, was also the author of "I Didn't Raise My Boy to Be a Soldier," which was in great favor among the pro-Germans and pacifists before we went into the war. When we did, it dropped out of sight instantly, and Bryan as quickly changed his sentiments and caught up with "Joan of Arc," which is as militaristic a song as could be written. It is irritatingly commonplace in words, but the music by Jack Wells is inspiring, and a French translation has been made of it, which is a real poem, whereas Bryan's English words are bathos, made all the worse by such absurd mistakes as placing Normandy among the victims of the German invader. In place of that blunder the French translator used words which in English would read, "The bells of Rheims they sound in pain," thus changing a turnip into a rose.

"Pack Up Your Troubles in Your Old Kit Bag" was as popular among the soldiers as any song. At home we sang more sentimental songs, such as "Your Boy and My Boy," "Hello, Central, Give Me No Man's Land," "Bring Back My Daddie to Me," "America, Here's My Boy!" and joined the soldiers in Geoffrey O'Hara's "K-K-K-Katy," which, written by an army man, has real soldier humor. It ranks with "The Captain with His Whiskers Stole a Sly Glance at Me," the comic soldier-song of the old war. In fact, the presence of so many merely sentimental and worthless songs is a fact growing out of the shortness of this war; they could be duplicated in the earlier war. It was not until that struggle had grown deadly that we came to such desperately earnest songs as "Rally 'Round the Flag." Yet the early days of that war gave us, on the Confederate side at least, such a splendid thing as Randall's "My Maryland!" and such a rousing battle-song as "The Bonnie Blue Flag." There has been nothing to approach them in the war just ended. As for the soldiers, they obstinately refused to sing martial songs set down for them, just as they have in this war; and where our soldiers sang "The Long, Long Trail," written before the war, so the soldiers of the civil war sang "The Years Creep Slowly By, Lorena," written before that conflict.

The two wars were linked in a noble fashion in one song. John Hay's fine poem, "When the Boys Come Home," written in civil war days, was set to fine music by Oley Speaks in 1917, and became the noblest musical expression that the A. E. F. ever found.—New York Times.

 "What was the middle name of Gluck?"
 "I beg, when did Debussy die?"
 "Should pianists say 'technique,' and why?"
 "What was the first tune ever heard?"
 "How can I tell a major third?"
 "Don't you admire Richard Strauss?"
 "They tell me Chopin was a souze."
 "Are tunics worn at concerts much?"
 "What pianist has the sweetest touch?"
 "Does Bori own a private yacht?"
 "Amato's coming, is he not?"
 "The cello's like the human voice?"
 "Of operas, what's your private choice?"
 "Caruso must have millions now."
 "I don't like Paderewski's bow."
 "Godowsky's in an awful fix."
 "Who sang 'Il Re' in '96?"
 "How can I get to concerts free?"

Leaders' Service Bureau.

Questions Answered—Suggestions Offered.

Q. WHERE can I obtain instruction in playing the flute in the vicinity of New York?

A. An excellent teacher for either the flute or piccolo, we are informed, is Mr. George Barrere, 316 West Ninety-seventh street, New York City. Several of the music schools, which you will find listed in the telephone directory, also have able instructors on the instruments mentioned.

Q. What is a "Jazz Band"? Could I play "Jazz" music in our small orchestra for the comedy?

A. An orchestra consisting of a piano, violin or clarinet, cornet, trombone or saxophone and drums thunders out rag-time music, and is known as a "Jazz Band." This music is bad enough anywhere, but has no place in a picture house, and would only drive the patrons away. Do not attempt it.

Q. Under the American copyright law, I am told, a person from a foreign country must have the plates made in America to secure an American copyright. How about England?

A. There is no law in Great Britain requiring the plates of a composition to be made in England in order to secure a copyright in that country.

Q. In our town we can get only non-union musicians. They leave at any whim, and we never know whether one or five of them will be in the theatre from day to day. The theatre owner talks of putting in an orchestral organ. Can you tell me something about these instruments?

A. It would seem that such an organ would be exactly what you need. An orchestral organ has all the trap attachments, and produces the effects of piano and drums combined. There are several different makes of these organs. All of them have some distinctive merits. So many questions have been asked us concerning orchestral organs that we hope soon to discuss two or three of the best editorially. We shall endeavor to explain the construction of each, and you can judge for yourself just which one most fully meets your requirements.

Man Who Made "Silver Threads" Famous.

Doubtless the great mass of popular songs have been made so largely through the personality of one particular singer. This fact is exemplified in "Silver Threads Among the Gold." Richard Hose, a light opera singer, with a beautiful lyric tenor voice, sang this song with an exquisite rendition and a pathos that deeply stirred his auditors.

Mr. Hose was known as "The silver-throated tenor," and was so billed in vaudeville. But life is not all roses for even the most gifted men, and Mr. Hose was greatly handicapped by a marked hesitancy in speech. Naturally, this affliction did not affect his art, for it is a well-known fact that this peculiar infirmity does not manifest itself in the voice while singing.

An amusing anecdote is related concerning Mr. Hose in this connection. One day, on a Philadelphia stage, he was taking his final curtain call when the drop was hastily lowered and hit him upon the back of the neck. Subsequently, he sued the theatre for heavy damages, claiming the shock to his nerves had left him with an impediment in speech. The "stammer" was undeniably apparent, but nature and not a stage-hand had wished it upon him.

Don't Forget—Send This Magazine "Overseas."

Washington, March.—The boys overseas are asking for more reading matter. General Pershing has cabled the request that more magazines be sent to the Americans on duty in France and in other countries in Europe. The General says the boys need interesting reading matter as never before. The supply of magazines has been reduced from ten to two tons a month due to misapprehension of the public that magazines could not be sent under the one-cent postage ruling. Put a one-cent stamp on the upper right-hand corner of the cover and deposit in mail box.

EVERY PICTURE NEEDS GOOD MUSIC

Belief in This Has Induced Leader Robert Cuscaden to Develop Elaborate System for Selecting Motifs Not Only to Suit Each Picture, but Also Each Actor

By Guy Leavitt

ARBITRARY reading as to tempo and dynamic signs are as worthless in motion picture playing as are academic musicians who have no real interest in moving pictures, according to Robert Cuscaden, orchestra leader at the Muse Theatre, Omaha, and rated as one of the best violinists of the Middle West.

Mr. Cuscaden leads his orchestra in the evening. During the day he wanders around to the other motion picture houses, getting an idea here, another there, and above all, satisfying his tremendous liking for moving pictures. He advances some decidedly new ideas along the lines of playing for moving pictures, one of the most striking being that each star has a particular bit of music that fits him or her, and that this bit should form the theme back of that star's acting.

Day of Baton Rapping Is Past.

"First, attention should be called, I think, to synchronizing the musical settings and the change of scene—for instance, stopping one piece in three flats, and at once jumping into another in three sharps," says Mr. Cuscaden. "The value of related keys is a wonderful thing to learn. Or the musical setting may be changed gradually. Do not make it necessary to break off in the middle of a phrase to fit a new scene. Have an understanding with the operator as to the rapidity of projection.

"I direct my orchestra with lights, operated by my foot. One light means to change to the next piece. Two flashes means to revert to the theme piece. The day of the orchestra leader who raps with his baton and breaks off the phrase in the middle, to leap into the next scene, is past.

"Needless to say, every musician should have an absolute knowledge of the contents of each composition. He should know that piece; he should know exactly what impression he wishes to convey in the use of every note he plays. The musical library for the picture theatre should be extensive; it should cover every phase of human emotion, and it should be kept constantly growing.

Original Theory Enunciated.

"Every screen star has an individual personality. The psychology of every such personality can be expressed by one particular piece of music better than by any other. For instance, to my mind, I think 'When You Are Truly Mine' expresses to perfection the psychology of Mae Marsh. I always resort to that piece somewhere in a Mae Marsh picture, and it fits, it makes no difference what picture she is playing.

"I do not think it is in the slightest degree beneath the musical director to resort to tricks in orchestra settings. I believe tricks show a rare appreciation of the possibilities in motion picture music. For instance, I find the greatest impression can sometimes be made by suddenly stopping—while the picture goes on. In comedy, everybody knows the value of trick playing there.

"Music Makes or Breaks Picture."

"Then, I would urge upon every musician interested in promoting the art of motion picture music the necessity of taking every performance seriously. It makes no difference if a picture is rotten. The patrons come, seriously and earnestly intending to see a picture. If you play through the rotten picture seriously three or four times, and then decide that because it is a rotten picture it is unnecessary to take such pains with your music, then you are not only doing an injustice to the picture, but you are doing an injustice to yourself and to your house.

"Music is the searchlight which may show up the weak points and the strong points in a picture; but it also can be made to cover up the weak points or the strong points. See a picture without music, and you will miss many things which the music shows to you. Everybody knows that. A clever orchestra can cover up the weaknesses in a picture. A clever orchestra can emphasize the strong points in a picture. A strong orchestra can make or break a picture.

Music Intensifies Dramatic Values.

"I like to think of the music interest in a picture as of an oration. The orator who does not know his business will start out in loud, bombastic fashion, and within ten minutes the interest of his audience is lagging. The orator who knows what he is about will start out calmly, quietly, and will keep steadily progressing until he reaches the climax, when he will drive home his points with all the vigor and eloquence at his command. Every picture should have this tendency, to grow toward a climax. The music can accentuate this tendency; it can increase the tensivity, and at the climax it can emphasize those scenes in a way that is remarkable to the uninitiated.

"But what I believe is one of the most important features of photoplay music is that the music should always be subordinate to the screen picture interest. People come to your house to see, not hear; to satisfy the sense of sight, not of hearing. Your music is merely to aid their seeing. It is an unobtruding stimulus to their imaginations.

Says Pictures Have "Rhythm."

"Every screen action, every emotion portrayed on the screen, vibrates with a distinct and a certain rhythm. The clever director will recognize that rhythm; he will find it, and express it in music.

"All music should seem as if composed for that picture for which it is played. It should fit. It should breathe in unison with the picture.

"In this connection, my principle is to avoid opera and well known songs that have a meaning or a text foreign to the subject matter of the picture. For instance, do not let your hearers hear a bit of music from an opera they have seen, unless the action that accompanied that music in the opera was identical with the action on the screen. For instance, I find music from 'Carmen' fits perfectly in some scene of a Spanish or Southern murder.

"There is a difference between tension and action. For instance, I have found that in some scenes a regular beat, beat, beat of music will produce a tension or will accompany a strenuous action far better than if placed in staccato time.

Small Use in Cheap Music.

"There are waltz movements and waltz movements. Every musician knows that. But there are some waltzes which picture every emotion. There are others, cheap things, that fit only into stereotyped places. I avoid these stereotyped bits wherever possible.

"I try to make my music fit into the atmosphere of the picture, of the house, of the patrons, of the lights. I try to make my music a part of the atmosphere. I mark my success by the patrons going from the house with a feeling that they have had a thoroughly enjoyable time; that everything, the seat they sat in, the ushers, the picture, the music, had been in harmony. The music has a more powerful part in this than has any other agency.

Cue Sheets Often Worthless.

"No musician has a place in motion picture theatre orchestra who has not imagination. He must picture the music as actually belonging to that scene. He must hear music with every scene.

"I am sorry to have to say it, but the cue sheets sent us are jokes. I can name the writers of worthwhile cue sheets on three fingers. In my hand here I hold a cue sheet sent by a producer who makes as many pictures as any other producer. This cue sheet is even less than a joke.

"I see each picture in advance, with a blank bit of paper before me. I jot down the musical version of each scene. Then I go up to my office and block it all out. I consider my work important."

American Cinema Completes Staff.

President Walter Niebuhr, of the American Cinema Corporation, 220 West Forty-second street, New York, this week announced the completion of the company's executive staff. Holmes C. Walton, who was for five years affiliated with Sanger & Jordan, and more recently specialized on the foreign film markets, has been selected as general sales manager for the corporation. Lucius Henderson has assumed charge of the company's producing program and is now engaged in planning future productions. Samuel Pierce Blackman, formerly president of the Memorial Photoplay Corporation, is business manager at the company studios.
